WHAT I SAW IN WARRING EUROPE

CONTINUING THE PERSONAL NARRATIVE OF THEODORE WATERS, WHO VISITED FIVE COUNTRIES IN THE INTERESTS OF THE CHRISTIAN HERALD RELIEF WORK

"Give Us This Day Our Daily Bread"

LAST week Mr. Waters told what he saw and experienced in Holland and in Belgium, the story describing the despatch of the Dutch steamer Jan Blockx with the Christian Herald cargo of foodstuffs to Belgium, and his own reception in that country as the representative of the Relief Fund for the Widows and Orphans of the War. He also told of his difficulties in arranging for a conveyance to take the party with which he found himself from Antwerp to Brussels, and of his experience in a hotel, when his companion rescued a miserable, forsaken cat from the cold, the incident setting their thoughts busy anew with the suffering all about them.—Editor.]

EARLY next morning we started in the ramshackle hack. Brussels lay twenty miles distant and our ride was over a road in which German troops had fought their way into Antwerp. Except for having to dodge motor cars crowded with German officers racing to and from Antwerp the ride was without interest until we passed the suburbs and saw a large number of Belgian prisoners working under German guard, repairing fortifications which they had once helped to defend. Evidently the Germans, in case the tide of war turned in the opposite direction, meant to use these very defenses against the enemy from whom they had taken them. And herein is contained the gruesome contingency that such an event poor Belgium must again pass through as much more horror, rapine and misery as she has already experienced.

Beyond the fortifications we saw the network of entanglements which had been erected for the confusion of the foe when it was charging the forts. Acres and acres of barbed wire, strung criss-cross in stakes three feet high and three feet apart, squares, diagonals, in-and-outs, up-and-downs, a perfect maze of saw-toothed wire. And beyond this series of funnel-shaped holes in the ground, perpendicular a foot deep and with a sharp-pointed stake sticking up reacherously from the bottom, ready to impale the foot of the horse that would attempt to gallop across that field. It was a formidable barrier that had to be seen to be appreciated. These barriers had been strung over the roads as well, as we knew from the great mass of tangled wires piled up on each side, where they had been cut through and thrown aside. But how in the world could the Germans, how could any army have surmounted such obstacles while exposed to the fire of the forts? It seemed incomprehensible. But perhaps there was a reason.

After that, as we drove along, we began to see evidences of the horrors that had been. As we drove through the ruined villages I could liken the trip to nothing else than going to a funeral with the cemetery a long way out. Indeed, the country was one huge burying ground. Always between the ruined houses we could see graves. Graves! graves! graves! In some would be stuck a bayonet with a Belgian soldier's cap hanging on it. Above others were rough white crosses, rudely inscribed, "To the memory of a Belgian soldier." On one grave was a child's shoe, poor little mark of its parent's grief. Graves, graves! Orphans, orphans! A country desolated, its trees felled in rows to make way for house with a hole made by a shell in the second story big enough to drive a wagon through. Two little girls looked out of this hole at us curiously. They were the only sign of life about the place. At the door of another house, the stucco front of which was spotted all over with bullet marks, stood a girl probably fourteen years old. Her peasant face was heavy and dull, her dress was ragged. She wore sabots but no stockings.

Another house had evidently been struck by a descending shell. Its whole front was gone and all of the floors except the third floor at the back, and there, hanging as it were on the edge of a precipice, was an old white enamel bed, a red coverlet still clinging to it. We saw innumerable houses intact, but with the handles of the doors gone and the places where they had been broken out, apparently with pick-axes. Evidently the soldiers had been there. And God knows what followed. Broken houses. Broken hearts. Yet the refugees were always on the road returning to just such desolate hearthstones farther on. Such is the homing instinct.

We stopped at Malines to look at the cathedral which had sustained considerable damage on the side that evidently had been in the line of fire. My traveling companion looked at some disconsolate peasants standing mutely by and seized with a generous impulse pulled out a handful of small coins and began handing them out. Instantly the place was in a turmoil. As though by magic men, women and children came running from every direction. A man with money! They crowded around him, fought to get at him and those who were nearest tore at his hands to secure even the smallest coin. They were frantic, mad, and finally to protect himself he flung all the coins he had left far from him. The crowd pursued the centimes and he escaped to the carriage. We drove away and left them fighting among themselves. His hands were literally scratched and torn from the nails of the mob. I gave him some peroxide in which to bathe his cuts. We wondered what would have happened had we offered them food.

Again and again we were stopped by German soldiers who demanded to see our passes, and always when that ceremony was through with a peasant carrying a tin box with a slot in the top would solicit a contribution for his commune. Meanwhile the refugees struggled onward in a never-ending procession.

As we approached Brussels and made several turnings off the main road we were directed by large white arrows painted by the Germans as a guide to the military in passing back and forth. We could not have lost the road unless we deliberately closed our eyes to the signs, the bullets. Its crops long gone to seed and sticking leanly up through the snow, dead things in rows like markers in a miniature cemetery. Houses in ruins or partly in ruins with the word "Bewoond" (occupied) chalked upon the doors to warn the homeless wayfarer that no more could be taken in. In some of the ruins women could be seen grubbing in the debris on the chance of finding some lost possession. We passed a woman trundling a heavy barrow on which were part of a stove and some small kitchen utensils. She did not even look up as we passed her by. In one village we saw a which were simply another evidence of German thoroughness. Finally in a suburb the carriage came to a stop, the driver climbed down and announced that this was as far as he dared go. Also he called attention to the fact that the tram road began and ended at this point, and demanded his pay. He got it, for we were glad enough to exchange his convertible barouche for something that moved faster than a walk. The tram came along presently, we climbed aboard and arrived at the American legation, where we delivered the mail late on a Saturday afternoon.

Our impressions of Brussels were novel, to say the least. Brussels in times of peace was one of the most remarkable cities on the continent. In many respects she was another Paris, highly concentrated, a Paris under a monarchy, and that means much. Moreover, the Bruxellois were noted as among the best livers in Europe. Also their love for their city was a civic passion. For them Brussels was the world. The idea of its being destroyed by German guns was abhorrent, not to be thought of; and so when the hated Allemands made ready to lay it under siege Chief Burgomaster Max voiced the sentiments and gained the enthusiastic affection of his people when he told the enemy they might enter unmolested. They did. Also they presented a carefully prepared list of wealthy residents and laid them and the city under a few million dollars' tribute. Then they occupied the principal city buildings, turned the royal palace into a military hospital, and proceeded to administer the laws of the city according to the German fashion. This included the posting all over town of many rules and regulations in which the word "verboden" (forbidden) figured largely. But right there the civic gorge of the Bruxellois began to rise. They might let the Allemand in and pay him millions of tribute to boot, but they'd be ding-busted if they'd let him regulate their habits of living. Burgomaster Max moreover went the Germans one better by posting placards all over town, telling the people to obey his orders and never mind the "verboden" signs. It was a painful situation—for a few hours—but it cleared at once when Burgomaster Max was courteously invited to accept an escort of German soldiers to Berlin, where he now is.

Nevertheless, the habits of a people are hard to break, and even after the Germans commandeered all the stored food many Bruxellois who still had money went on wining and dining in the restaurants and hotels, while people in the poorer districts were already beginning to feel the press of want. Furthermore, in such instances, it is always easier to purchase a luxury than a necessity. Wherefore a superficial observer noting the brilliancy of certain public places might have concluded that privation was by no means imminent. But the law of nature, the law of supply and demand, gradually began to make itself felt, and so between the upper millstone of the Germans and the lower millstone of necessity the people of Brussels were slowly but surely ground. Wherefore, when we entered the city on that memorable Saturday afternoon, it was a subdued little capital that we found, and the undercurrent of impending misery was becoming increasingly apparent to observers.

Soldiers dominated the prospect as they did everywhere in Belgium, well-fed soldiers, who strode along with the conscious air of the conqueror, or so it seemed, and well-dressed, fur-clad women promenaded the avenues; but these ran a long gauntlet of sad-eyed, thinly-clad women, many of them holding babies snuggled under shawls, and some of them with little whimpering children clinging to their skirts as they shivered in the growing dusk. We asked several of these to tell us their troubles. But this it was difficult for them to do with their lack of English and our indifferent French. It generally resolved itself into a simple statement of "Man in army," or "Man dead." Money we found was the only language we could make them understand, and such coins as we gave them spoke volumes, judging by the nods, smiles and even tears they bestowed on us as they hurried away. After all it is a terrible thing to be hungry and cold. However, it must not be supposed that every one in Brussels was without realization of what might portend. A number of men of affairs had banded themselves into a relief committee, made requisition on all food supplies that had not already been taken over by the Germans, ferreted out secret stores laid up in thrifty communes and compelled these communes to hand over all in excess of their share, established a central depot where soup and bread could be made and distributed through forty sub-depots, and realizing what a short time the food supply on hand would last, issued plaintive appeals to the world to send more before the supply ran out. And it was running very short when the Christian Herald cargo on the Jan Blockx reached Brussels.

Under the arrangements made by the American committee with the nations at war all food had to be consigned to American Minister Brand Whitlock in Brussels. The food was shipped in the Jan Blockx to Rotterdam, whence it was loaded into barges and towed into the country. From Brussels it was shipped to various points—Louvain, Liège, Rheims, etc. Naturally I was anxious to pursue the individual food that had been bought by the Christian Herald

Family and actually see it fed to the people. The food from the Jan Blockx was expedited in shipment. It reached Brussels and the point of it intended for that city was sent immediately to the central depot.

It was on a Sunday morning when under escort of an interpreter from the American Legation we walked over to the central depot. It was cold, but the sun shone beautifully, and our walk took past some of the most picturesque buildings in perhaps the most picturesque city in Belgium—past the royal palace, every window of which held a large German red cross; past the Church of Gudule, with its famous Pulpit of Truth; through that wonderful public square of the guild houses, with their gilt facings; through the Hotel de Ville, one of the most wonderfully beautiful pieces of architecture in the world; through back courtyards, down alleyways with overhanging houses, through a main business street and finally in a large octagonal building, the center court of which was three stories high and which was cloudy with the steam from huge caldrons cooking soup.

There indeed were bags of flour which had come on the Jan Blockx. Bakers were kneading dough out of the flour from the bags. There were the bags of peas being dumped into the great soup pots. It was a veritable hive of industry. Wagons came in from the outlying depots, gathered up loads of bread or tanks of soup and went away again. In that depot were made each day over two hundred thousand rations of soup and bread, and it kept the crews of bakers and steamers at work day and night to supply the need. We watched the scene until noon and then went over to the nearest distributing depot to see the food given out.

This distributing depot was a school house in a poor quarter of the city. Long before we reached it through back streets we noticed a gradually thickening stream of poor people, mostly women and children, carrying pitchers, pots, pails, on the way to the depot. As we have said, the sun was shining. It was the Sabbath morning. Internally there was every incentive to be joyous. But these people were not joyous. They were sad, without language even. A great number wore sabots and the clatter of these on the stones rose louder and louder as their number increased. It was symbolical of their growing need, of an ominously increasing clamor on the door of the world's charity. When they reached the school house they formed in orderly lines and waited each for his or her turn.

In order to prevent possible duplication or repeating a ticket system had been adopted. Only non-combatants are entitled to receive food. No soldier need apply. Most of the applicants are widows and orphans and as the Christian Herald Fund is for the Relief of the Widows and Orphans of European War, it was arranged that tickets for the Jan Blockx food should be issued to these only. Occasionally a decrepit old man stood in line, as the spirit of charity is broad no one with a heart would wish to deprive such a one of food. After investigation a ticket is issued to each family head. A large figure from 1 to 7 is stamped on each ticket, according to the number in each family, and that many rations of bread and soup are issued to each ticket holder. Around the edge of each meal ticket are numbers from 1 to 31, and as the ticket is presented one of these numbers is punched day after day. Once a week a special ration of potatoes and fuel is issued to each ticket holder.

Is it necessary to go into detail concerning that sad line of people, each with a heartfelt "merci," uttered as the food was received, each hurrying away with a pitcher or pail of soup hugged under coat or shawl to keep the warmth until the little ones at home could partake of its abiding nurture? No one needs a recital of details to realize the misery that lies behind it, of the homes desolated, of the hearts broken, of the grief that will last through the years.

And what is true of Brussels is true in greater degree of all Belgium. Belgium in times of peace imports five-sixths of all her food supplies. On account of the war she is not now able to import those five-sixths, nor is she able to produce the remaining one-sixth. If she does not receive food from America, and that is her only source of supply, her people, rich and poor alike, will starve, and starvation will spell ruin. For when people are hungry they are apt to commit ill-advised reprisals against the military, and if that happens—but such a catastrophe is too horrible to contemplate.

Give them this day their daily bread.

America is getting under this huge burden of woe wonderfully. It rests with us of the Christian Herald Family to keep up at the highest possible point of efficiency the fund for the relief of the widows and orphans. This special form of helpfulness reaches the very heart of the suffering. Address: Widows and Orphans Fund, the Christian Herald, Bible House, New York.

CHILDREN OF SOLDIERS FED BY ORGANIZATIONS IN BERLIN

FAR WESTERN LANDS OF PROMISE

NO UNDERTAKING of the United States Government has had more remarkable results than the reclamation of arid land in the west by the construction of irrigation projects and the impounding of water in the wet season to be used in the dry season. The government, through its reclamation service, has created lands of promise; indeed, lands of fulfillment for nearly twenty-four thousand families now on the farms and in the villages established by the service. No charge is made for the land; the settler pays only what it has cost the government to reclaim it, and in easy instalments. A conservative estimate is that 30,000,000 acres of arid land will ultimately be reclaimed for homes for more than a million families.

C. J. Blanchard, statistician for the reclamation service, who has been identified with the work almost from the start, says: "The democracy of the irrigated section always impresses the newcomer. It is due to the small farm, the independence of the owners and the social equality of the people. Conditions compel association and organization in harvesting and marketing high-priced products. The narrow provincialism which has marked life where farms are large is not found here. Rural delivery of mails, with daily papers, the county telephone, traveling libraries, centralized schools, and trolley lines to the towns, are all serving to bring the desert farmer within the stimulating currents of the world's thought."

To utilize the snowfall of the winter and the rainfall of the rainy season, it remained but for man's industry and intelligence to grapple with the facts. The engineer found no field more attractive than this for his energies. He curbed the stream with masonry dams and lifted the water into huge canals. Water and land long divorced are wedded, and waving fields of grain and orchards prolific beyond comparison replace the wastes of sand and sage brush.

"How should a person proceed to get a government farm?" the writer asked Mr. Blanchard.

"Getting a government farm is comparatively a simple proposition," he replied. "Making good on it is quite another matter. In the first instance the government has made the way easy and inexpensive. Any citizen of the United States who has not used his homestead right is qualified to make a filing on any surveyed public lands not withdrawn from entry. A single woman of legal age, or a widow, is entitled to the privileges of homestead entry."

"After a personal inspection of the vacant land desired for a home the homeseeker proceeds to the proper local land office or land commissioner and makes his application. If accepted, he deposits his filing of $8 for an 80-acre farm or $16 for a 160-acre tract. If the entry is made on an irrigation project he must pay, in addition to the above amount, five per cent. of the building charge, and when due, the annual charge for operation and maintenance. On the irrigation projects containing lands now open to entry the building charge ranges from $30 to $60 per acre and is payable in twenty years without interest. The charge for operation and maintenance averages about $1 per acre and is payable annually. This charge will vary on the different projects and according to the amount of water used. Summing up the initial cost of obtaining a government-irrigated farm of forty acres, the settler will find it necessary to expend $6.50 for filing fees; if the construction charge is $50 per acre he will pay $100 for the first instalment and, when due, about $40 for the operation and maintenance assessment—a total of $146.50.

"In the second, third, fourth and fifth years following the only payments required are the annual charges for operation and maintenance, about $40. Thus, in five years, the settler is obliged to pay to the government approximately $306.50.

DESERT LAND IN WYOMING BEFORE IRRIGATION

"The balance of the unpaid construction charges are paid in fifteen annual instalments, beginning on December 1 of the fifth year, the first five of which are each five per cent., the remainder seven per cent. of the construction charge without interest. The secretary of the interior is authorized to require the reclamation for agricultural purposes and the cultivation of one-fourth of the irrigable area within three full irrigation seasons, and one-half of the irrigable area within five full seasons.

"On the basis of a construction charge of $50 per acre and an annual operation and maintenance charge of $1 per acre, the entire investment of the settler on a forty-acre project at the end of the twenty years' term will be, first, filing of $6.50; second, a construction charge of $2,000; and third, operating assessments of $800; a total of $2,806.

"Investigations carried on for a number of years show that the settlers who have taken up government farms, as a rule, have had a small capital, from $1,000 to $3,000 in cash and equipment. Necessarily their progress has been slow by reason of this handicap. It is a fact, however, that the majority of those who have shown industry, judgment and business ability have been able to overcome the handicap of small means, and after a few years of hard work and some sacrifices have won out.

"It may therefore be said that the average man who takes up a government-irrigated farm of forty acres should possess a capital of at least $2,500, and not less than $4,000 if he undertakes to sublet an eighty-acre tract.

"The type of farming to be selected should be based on the character of the crops to which the climate, the soil and the farmer are adapted.

"As a matter of fact the great bulk of the farming population is more particularly adapted to semi-intensive or diversified farming. For these the forty-acre farm unit is well adapted, and it is this size of farm that should generally be favorably considered. On this size of farm the raising of fruit can be practiced on a small scale; dairying can be carried on successfully; the raising of hogs, sheep or poultry can readily be practiced; and a multiplicity of profitable ways exist in which the operations can be varied."

The service issues a monthly paper, the Reclamation Record. It might be well for you to send for it and see what is being done on Uncle Sam's irrigation projects scattered over the west, or if you care to you can write to the Statistician, United States Reclamation Service in Washington, and you will receive a card which you may fill in and return, and you will then be furnished with detailed information which will suit your case. During 1913 the crop values on irrigated areas occupied by 16,000 farms exceeded $15,700,000. THOMAS O. MONK.

SMALL IRRIGATED TRACT SCIENTIFICALLY FARMED

AN IRRIGATED FIELD OF OATS IN SHOCK

THE WAYS OF GOD

A SERMON BY

REV. J. H. JOWETT, D.D.*

"Doth the plowman plow continually to sow? Doth he continually open and break the clods of his ground?"
Isa. 28: 24, R.V.

WE ARE bidden to look at the farmer, and then we are bidden to look at the farmer's God. We are questioned as to our common observations in the world of agriculture, and then we are challenged to make commanding inferences in the world of providence and grace. Watch the ways of the farmer, says the prophet, and then infer the ways of God. "Doth the plowman plow continually?" Is he always plowing? No. The plowing is preparatory to other labors and it yields its place to them. "Doth he continually open and break the clods of his ground?" Is he always pulverizing the soil? No, plowing is only one thing, and it is related to other things, and the plow is supplanted by another ministry which follows it in ordered sequence. "When he hath made plain the face thereof doth he not cast abroad the fitches, and scatter the cummin, and put in the wheat in rows, and the barley in the appointed place, and the spelt in the border thereof?" Of course he does; action follows action, each action looking forward to the next, and all of them succeeding one another in reasonable process and gradual culmination.

"For the fitches are not threshed with a sharp threshing instrument." Why not? Because the delicate growths would be bruised, and no vital purpose would be served, and all the fruit of the previous toil would be destroyed. "Neither is the cart-wheel turned about upon the cummin." Why not? Because such brutal usage would destroy the crop, and so make the farmer's life a maddening futility. "But the fitches are beaten out with a staff, and the cummin with a rod"; so that even though the seeds appear to be so much alike the farmer varies the process in securing them for his garner. "Is bread corn crushed?" Does the farmer maul his corn and pound it into a mush upon the threshing-floor? No, "he will not ever be threshing it and drag his cart wheels and his horses over it; he doth not crush it."

The End from the Beginning

Are you beginning to feel the force and the spirit of the challenge? We have been watching the logical and progressive processes of agriculture and what have we seen? We have seen that the farmer's life is not a collection of isolated and unrelated events. The farmer's varied labors constitute a process, inspired by reason, governed by purpose, with an intelligent and orderly adjustment of means to ends. The farmer does not stumble along in blind and stupid movement. His movements have eyes. His work today has its eyes on tomorrow. One act reaches forward to another act. And so the succession becomes a living sequence, and everything is joined to everything else in vital and reasonable communion.

Such is the observation; now for the splendid inference. Who gave the farmer this power of foresight, this grasp of purpose, this command of process and issues? And this is the answer of the prophet: "It is God. His God doth instruct him aright and doth teach him." Then comes the prophet's challenge: shall God, who inspired the farmer with vision, with long reach of purpose, with power of imagination which joins the plowshare to the sickle, and unites the broken clod with the golden grain, shall God himself be without eyes, having no foresight, no reasonableness, no governing purpose, no plan? Shall the farmer move with intelligence, and shall God who made him move in blindness? And shall all God's acts be dark happenings, with no reasonable relation and having no tendency to "one far off divine event to which the whole creation moves?" And the answer of the old Book is this: "If a farmer can stretch out both hands, and with one grasp the plowshare and with the other grasp the sickle, if he can hold in one vision the breaking clod and the yellowing grain, so also can the Lord God, "who is wonderful in counsel and excellent in wisdom." And so, I say, we are bidden to watch the ways of the farmer and then shape our conception of the ways of God.

Well, then, with this permitted liberty of inference, and watching the farmer, what can we say about the ways of God? First of all, we can say this: a wise purpose runs through all the apparently isolated acts of God. That is the message of farming. Farming knows no unrelated acts. And that also is the message of grace. No act of God stands alone, a vain and empty happening, devoid of wise significance. Every act of God has a "why" reaching backward into yesterday, and a "wherefore" reaching forward into tomorrow. No act of God happens without reason, and the reason has its beginning and ending in his sovereign holiness and love. In the life of the farmer it is the harvest which stamps every act with significance. And in the doings of our God a reasonable purpose makes everything significant. Nothing is a wayward stroke of ill luck, as nothing is a stray gleam of good chance. Nothing is without eyes, nothing is without sense, nothing is blind or mad. Everything is part of a reasoned and reasonable process, and is moving toward a perfectly defined and gloriously illumined end.

He Doeth All Things Well

And so it is in the graver happenings in human life. We can have confidence in the reasonable purpose of God even when the isolated acts appear to be without light and leading. You can point me to the battlefields of Europe, and I am gravely confused. You ask me to lay my finger upon the process, and to trace the bright thread of purpose running through the horrible entanglement. You perplex me in a thousand ways. When you point me to the desolate homes in Belgium, and England, and Germany, and Russia, and France, and to all the unutterable range of tragedy and woe, and ask me why God permitted it, and where is the connecting thread of holy purpose, I feel like a child who knows nothing about the making of strong linen, and who is watching the newly cut flax, with all its bonnie flowers upon it, as it is thrown into tanks to rot. I have no glimpse of the line of reason, but all the more do I fall back upon a reasonable God. I take my stand upon the revealed Word of the living God: "He also is wonderful in counsel and excellent in wisdom." "He that planned the ear, shall he not hear: he that formed the eye, shall he not see?" God doth instruct the plowman, who, while he breaks the clods, can see the harvest. And God also is wise! With God there are no accidents, no unilluminated moments, no uncertain twilights, no stumblings. "Nothing walks with aimless feet." The Lord God has the end in sight, he sees the end of the process when we can only see the single act. And "the end of the Lord," says the Word of Grace, "is very pitiful." "This is the will of God—the end of God—"even your sanctification." "The end . . . everlasting life." "The Lord of Hosts is wonderful in counsel, and excellent in wisdom."

Now, this reasonable purpose runs through everything and binds together apparent contradictions. Turn from the fields of the farmer to the more solemn fields of human life. Think of all the ministries which the great Father employs in the growing and perfecting of souls. What a strange medley of apparent contradictions! Just look at them: Hopes and fears, sickness and health, failure and defeat, laughter and tears, the oil of joy and the drought of affliction, labor and rest, gain and loss, the lovely light of the wedding morn, and the chilling shadow of death! What a medley! God uses a sorrow sharp as a harrow, and he also uses a peace tender as the dew. He uses the plowshare of calamity, and he also uses the gentle intimacies of lovely friendships. What a medley! Yes, but "doth the plowman continually open and break the clods of his ground?" Nay, he changes and varies the ministry; the breaking of the clod leads to the sowing of the seed; but the breaking is as reasonable and significant as the sowing, and all the changes are inspired with one significance and reach forward towards the golden harvest. And the divine purpose, the purpose which abides in the love of God, unites hopes and fears, and laughter and tears, and all these apparently hostile and contradictory experiences in a process which will assuredly culminate in a harvest of blessedness and glory. "Hath he not promised, and shall he not do it?" "This also cometh from the Lord of Hosts, which is wonderful in counsel and excellent in wisdom."

It Shall Accomplish That Whereto He Sent It

And so the divine means are perfectly adjusted to the divine ends. The farmer does not drive his cart-wheels over the cummin. What farmer would send his clumsy farm cart across the field where the tender corn is springing? The farmer's purpose is not to crush, but to create. Yes, the farmer is a minister of creation, and he adjusts every implement and every expedient to serve that royal end. And in all the processes of divine providence the purpose of our God is to create and not to destroy. "The thief cometh not but that he may steal and kill and destroy; I am come that ye might have life, and that ye might have it more abundantly"; and therefore even his grievous and burdensome ministries are scrupulously adjusted to the service of this blessed and holy end. My brethren, we need not be crushed. "Grace doth much more abound!" There is always a sufficiency of grace, if we will but take it; grace sufficient to prevent calamity becoming a moral and spiritual disaster. There is always a sufficiency of grace to convert a difficulty into a spiritual servant. There is always a sufficiency of grace to transform a gloomy task into a wealthy opportunity, to make a heavy sorrow a gracious help-meet of the spirit, to transfigure even death itself by the soft, sweet dawn of eternal life and glory.

No, we need not be crushed. It is not our Father's will to crush us. He will not break the tender cummin with the wheel of his cart, nor bruise it with his horsemen. No, a gracious Lord has the harvest day in sight, even when he is breaking up the clods; and even while we are being broken, in his vision the mellow corn is waving, and at the end of the long, changeable day he will be abundantly justified.

"He also is wise." "He is wonderful in counsel and excellent in wisdom." Trust him. "Let not your heart be troubled, neither let it be afraid."

A NEW YEAR'S PETITION

Light of the Years!
The way is all unknown—
Make plain my path to me,
Give me a faith serene—
The end I cannot see!
Deepen my trust! Brighten my hope!
Ere comes the evening time—
O Light of the Years!

Light of the Years!
Give me a work to do—
A life in service spent!
If mine but humble part,
Give me a soul content!
Sweeten my heart! Dispel my pride!
Ere comes the evening time—
O Light of the Years!

Light of the Years!
Give me a vision clear
To see and know the right!
A courage that is strong
To do it with my might!
Quicken my powers! Enlarge my mind!
Ere comes the evening time—
O Light of the Years!

Light of the Years!
In midst of Life's hard fight,
And its strife and stress,
When burdened oft with care,
Thy presence soothes distress—
Strengthens my soul and nerves my will
To toil till evening time—
O Light of the Years!

DAILY MEDITATION

The Balances of God

SUNDAY, January 10. I Samuel 2: 3. "God is a God of knowledge, and by him actions are weighed." We are apt to measure things by their size and not by their weight. We too often prefer the things which make the most show. We admire big things and we are not deeply concerned with their essential content. And so we appreciate the Pharisee's loud-sounding offering more than the widow's mite. We are more attracted by swelling rhetoric than by simple speech. We delight in the big canvas. We rejoice in pageants and demonstrations. Our admiration is usually determined by scale rather than by weight.

But our God weighs things. He weighs our offerings, and he weighs them in his own spiritual scales, to see what spiritual significance there is in them. He weighs our money gifts to ascertain their weight of sacrifice. And so it comes to pass that the widow's mite wins his praise rather than the rich man's abundance. He weighs our prayers to see what weight of holy desire there is in them. Prayers may be very long and very empty, and in the scales of God they are as light as the lightest chaff. In our prayers it is a desire that weighs heavily, and penitence, and humility, and serious purpose of amendment. In our intercessions it is our self-forgetfulness that wins the favor of the Lord—our sacrifice in thoughtfulness, our true sympathy, the burden of our brother's need. God weighs our joys, and it is our thankfulness which reveals its mighty presence in the scales. In the estimation of the Lord many things are very weighty which have no regard in the esteem of the world.

It is the spiritual and the sacrificial which truly count in all things. Without these everything is light as vanity, however imposing the display it makes in the eyes of the world. J. H. J.

Walking in the Light

MONDAY, January 11. Isaiah 2: 1-11. "Come ye and let us walk in the light of the Lord." Isaiah was walking there and desired that all might share his comfort and illumination. The night still hangs over the world, though the eastern sky is lightening. Still we are not at home; there are crags and torrents, moors and fells, pitfalls and precipices before us. We do not ask to see the distant scene, but sorely need a kindly light for our steps. There is a way, because we were created into good works which God before prepared that we should walk in them. But how can we find it? The answer is given in the invitation to walk in the light of the Lord—to look at everything in the light of Christ.

A new friendship, a fresh departure, an inviting investment of your life is suggested by a friend, a book, or a sudden inspiration. It appeals to you. You are strongly attracted. It seems right in your own eyes. It may be the right way. But before adopting it hold it for at least a week in the light of our Lord's words, life, cross, throne and coming. Don't plead for it; don't argue for it; but let it be naked and open to the eyes of Him with whom we have to do. What would Jesus do? What would he wish me to do? Would it please and help him in his redeeming work if I were to enter upon it? Remember that you must be absolutely unbiased and candid. Beware of Balaam's mistake, who asked counsel of the Lord, but was biased by Barak's gold. Let us go up to the mountain of the Lord. He will teach us his ways and we will walk in his paths. F. B. M.

For the Sake of Others

TUESDAY, January 12. John 17: 19. "For their sakes I sanctify myself." "What you have done, that is your kingdom," said Carlyle. He might have added, what you have done, not for yourself, but for the sake of a person or a just cause, that is your kingdom.

The writer was attending a student conference on the Pacific coast. A small band of students came up from the University of Idaho. Among them were two young men who could not be persuaded to attend the meetings which were being held to consider the best ways to improve the moral and religious life of the colleges in that section. One was a great college leader. He was captain of the football team and had more influence in his university than any score of other men. His name was Larsen. He had come up in the mining camps and the saw-mills of the great Northwest. His life had been filled with every sort of wild experience. Certain students of Idaho, interested for the welfare of the college, had persuaded him to come to the conference in the hope that his life might be changed. His most intimate friend had come with him on condition that neither would be asked to attend the meetings, but would only engage in the athletic games. Toward the end of the conference, one evening, Larsen's friend came to me and said: "The boys say Larsen is going home without being influenced by the conference. They say I can influence him. I have come to ask if you will tell me how I can be a Christian in order that I can help save Larsen." I told the young man as best I could, and he, as I believe, gave himself to God with all the earnestness of this unselfish resolve. He then went out to find his friend. The next morning this young man came to me about six o'clock and said: "Larsen has come across!" He had worked and talked all night with the college leader as they walked on the shores of the Pacific. "Just before daybreak," as the friend described the scene, "Larsen thrust his hand into mine and said, 'There must be something in a religion which will cause you and these other men to do what they have done for me. I am going to give my life to God.'" He went back to the University of Idaho to take a stand that fairly revolutionized the student life of that institution—all because a few men and his intimate friend did something, not for their own sakes, but for the sake of Larsen.

Not for myself alone, but for the sake of the man who is under my influence, I determine to sanctify, to rectify my life. Thus I follow in the steps of him who said, "For their sakes." C. S. C.

The Soul's Recognition of Christ

WEDNESDAY, January 13. John 1: 19-34. "I am not worthy." The speaker was he whom Jesus characterized as one of the greatest of woman-born. When the Baptist uttered these words men were musing in their hearts concerning him, whether haply he were the Christ; but he confessed and denied not. He was not the Christ, not Elijah, not the prophet, but just a voice. He even shrank from baptizing Christ. The man who was no bending reed in the presence of an infuriated king and court avowed that he was not worthy to loose the shoe-latchet of his cousin from Nazareth. How superlatively great Jesus Christ must be to elicit such testimony from such a man—"This is the Son of God!"

Is not the estimate of Christ's contemporaries more reliable than that of these degenerate days? Would the Baptist have stooped so low to any human being? Is there not an intuitive recognition of great souls, when a Greater than the sons of men arrives? Yes, Jesus is Son of God. The more like him you become the more sure you will be of this. And the more you resemble him, the closer you live to him, the more often you will say: "I am not worthy." Then your eyes will be opened to see his presence, to recognize him as the Lamb of God and to behold the Spirit of God descending and abiding on you and on the church. "I am not worthy; mine eyes have seen the King, the Lord of Hosts. Then flew one of the seraphim unto me." . . . F. B. M.

Are You Somebody's Friend?

THURSDAY, January 14. John 15: 13. "Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends." Some years ago a young man came to me, saying: "I want to ask of you the greatest favor I ever asked of any man in my life." I expected he wanted a larger sum of money than usual, or perhaps desired my aid in getting a better position. He hastened to tell me, however, that he had been in New York for eight months and during this time he had found no one who seemed to care whether he lived or died. "My heart is breaking for friendship," said he; "I must tell someone the things that are deepest and most important in my life." Then, looking at me frankly and earnestly, he said: "Will you be my friend?"

There are hundreds of men and women all about us whose hearts are breaking for friendship. Men can live and be happy without much money, without fame and without great learning—but few can live the happy, worth-while life without a friend. Charles Kingsley was once asked the reason for his devoted life. He answered simply, "I had a friend."

Jesus was the ideal Friend of men. He was called the Friend of Sinners," because he never turned away from people simply because they were bad. He was able to put himself in another's place. He taught and he lived the principle that friendship meant helping, really caring and having undeviating confidence that in every person there is some element of goodness worth loving.

Today I am going out to meet opportunity for being a friend. It is one of the simplest but greatest opportunities of life. Someone is to be happier and greater today because of my friendship.

Let me live in a house by the side of the road
Where the race of men go by,
Men that are bad and men that are good,
As bad and as good as I.
Let me not sit in the corner's seat,
Nor hurl the evildoer's ban,
But live in a house by the side of the road
And be a friend to man.

The Uplift of the Christ Life in Us

FRIDAY, January 15. Ephesians 1: 15-22. "The exceeding greatness of his power towards us who believe." Another rendering is—"the transcendent greatness of his power in us believers, as seen in the working of his infinite might, when he raised Christ from the dead." In other words, the resurrection-power is certainly in us, if we believe. "Dost thou believe in the Son of God?" Then, though hitherto you may have been unaware of it, that power is within you. Alas, that you have allowed it to run to waste, or blocked it by the debris of your cares or avarice! Thus it has become neutralized and fruitless. "Roll ye away the stone!"

When Israel journeyed to Beer—the well beyond the Arnon—the first thing was for the princes and nobles to dig and delve, removing the accumulated silt. Then sang Israel this song: "Spring up, O well!" Here is the clue to a holy life! We must believe that Christ's resurrection life is within us by the Holy Spirit. The sap is in the branch; the blood in the limb; the power of the first Easter is at work in the depths of our hearts. Now make way for it! In any moment of dryness, or drought, or temptation, or depression, say with Israel of old: "Spring up, O well; rise up in me, O Christ; work in me, thou Divine Energy that raised Jesus from the dead, and lift me also to his side." This appeal cannot be in vain! The Christ-life will arise in thee! Spring will break through the heavy clods! Thou also shalt know and experience the power of his resurrection. Sursum corda! F. B. M.

Loving Obedience Leads to Knowledge

SATURDAY, January 16. John 7: 17. "If any man will do his will, he shall know of the doctrine." "To be or not to be; that is the question"; but to know or not to know is a still greater question. To know in our narrow capacity, something as God knows, of destiny, of truth and love, in their relations to his universe, is the highest reach of the human soul. What am I? Whence am I? Whither am I going? Only God can tell you. To know thyself is to know him. Do his will and you will know. What is his will? First, that you believe Christ and accept him as your Saviour. Second, that you love God and your neighbor.

Loving obedience solves mysteries. You come to know that you are only a little lower than the angels, created in God's image, his offspring, to be crowned with glory and honor; that you are endowed with immortal powers—"divineness run in a finite mold." Destined to dwell in God's family forever. All noble doing springs from the conscious experience of God in the soul. Knowledge and love, mind and heart, act reciprocally upon each other. "Live my life and you will soon have my creed," said Pascal. Everlasting life, joy and peace are yours now; eternity is in the heart here. E. W. C.

PASTOR A. C. DIXON of the Metropolitan Tabernacle, London, writes: "God is going to a glorious revival in Spurgeon's old tabernacle. During the past three weeks, no less than three hundred have decided for Christ on public confession of faith. There never was a better time to win to Christ than in the homes of this great city, from which the soldiers have gone to the battlefield, and my heart yearns to extend the work by opening halls and theater and central place for preaching and singing the Gospel to the thousands who are ready to come out to hear."

THE WAR IN EUROPE

SOLDIERS OF THE SEVENTH REGIMENT OF THE LINE (BELGIAN) MARCHING ALONG THE SEASHORE

BEFORE commencing to review the naval history of the war it might be entertaining to many of my readers who are unfamiliar with the sea and at the same time assist them to a clearer appreciation of the events, if a short description of the principal naval units and weapons were given.

The units used in most modern navies are battleships, armored cruisers, protected cruisers, light cruisers, torpedo destroyers, torpedo boats and submarines. Battleships are now divided into pre-dreadnoughts, dreadnoughts, and super-dreadnoughts. This name dreadnought is the name of a British battleship launched about eight years ago, which completely revolutionized battleship construction, and hence its name is used to designate battleships built on its model.

A battleship is the type of war vessel which carries the heaviest guns and the heaviest armor. This armor covers the ship from the water-line upwards on the sides to the main deck and extends over the main deck, and is of steel varying from eight to fourteen inches thick. The speed of a battleship is moderate, and space is not sacrificed in order to carry a large supply of coal. They are intended for effective action near their base of supplies, and are able to deliver the most powerful and telling blows and themselves to stand a great deal of punishment. A battleship has three weapons, guns, ram and torpedoes; but the last two can only be used in special circumstances. The guns on battleships vary from 10 inches to 15 inches bore, these last being only found on the very newest ships.

The dreadnought type of battleship differs from the older types in the principle of the increase in power of the larger guns, and the elimination of the smaller armament. Expressed in another way, this is the substitution of an effective fire at longer range and with fewer shots, in place of the older ideal of a vessel which can hurl the greatest amount of lead at an effective range. A battleship is called a super-dreadnought when her guns are at least of 13½ inches bore. The battle-cruiser is practically the same thing as a battleship excepting that the cruiser has greater speed. These are displacing armored cruisers. Armored cruisers are vessels of large size possessing ample room for large coal bunkers. They carry lighter armor, and have sufficient speed to run away from a battleship attack. They carry only a few heavy guns, but are well equipped with secondary batteries.

Cruisers are very lightly armored warships, carry only medium-sized guns as their main battery, can carry enough coal to have a large cruising radius and should have enough speed to run away from battieships and armored cruisers. Protected cruisers have a light armor over the vital parts of the ship, while light cruisers are practically unarmored.

Torpedo destroyers and torpedo boats are to a certain extent the same thing in that their primary weapon of offense is the torpedo. They both have great speed so as to be able to deliver their attack and get away. The destroyer is larger and a better sea boat than the torpedo boat, and it has the additional duty of protecting the main fleet from torpedo boat attacks, for which purpose it carries guns of sufficient calibre to make it dangerous at short range. The building of torpedo boats proper has practically stopped in favor of the destroyers. The submarine is sufficiently known not to require description. Its only weapon at present is the torpedo, though now some are being built with a small gun as an additional weapon.

Usually a battleship is over 10,000 tons and an armored cruiser the same. Cruisers vary from one to eight thousand tons; destroyers, torpedo boats, and submarines are all small. The table following Kiel in the Baltic, and that fleet has practically remained in that position. This resulted in that portion of the Russian fleet which was in the Baltic to the east of Kiel being also bottled up by the superior German fleet between it and the exit from the Baltic. The Russian fleet took refuge in the fortified port of Cronstadt, and there remained most of the time.

Class	Britain	France	Germany	Austria	Russia
Dreadnoughts and super-dreadnoughts	26	1	17	1	..
Old battleships	40	21	27	12	10
Armored cruisers	..	19	9	3	6
Cruisers and light cruisers	118	12	36	9	8
Destroyers	228	81	140	15	93
Submarines	77	55	27	6	14

The German fleet was in a slightly more advantageous position. This fleet possesses two other bases, Wilhelmshaven on the North Sea, and the Island of Helgoland in the North Sea, both of which it has access to by the Kiel Canal, which connects the Baltic and the North Sea, and to these bases part of its units occasionally resorted.

Only one action has taken place in the North Sea, on August 28, off Helgoland, which resulted in the sinking of five German units, three cruisers and two destroyers, with little loss to the British. This was about evened late in September when a German submarine attacked and sunk three British armored cruisers a little to the south of the scene of the previous action. Other minor actions in the North Sea resulted in the sinking of various small cruisers, destroyers and submarines, some by the Germans and some by the British. The British lost two vessels, one a super-dreadnought and the other a battleship, in October and November respectively, from rather mysterious causes.

At the time when the war broke out the Germans had several vessels isolated in various parts of the world, the best known of which, from her subsequent exploits, was the Emden. These have all, except two, been sunk or interned. A small German fleet, cruising in the Pacific at the outbreak of hostilities, defeated a British squadron off the Chilean coast on the 1st of November, and was in turn itself defeated off the Falkland Islands on the 8th of December.

Various German auxiliary cruisers have been sunk or captured from time to time. There have been several minor sea fights between Russians and Turks and between the Germans and Russians, with results not particularly affecting the general situation. In mid-December the Germans made a shows the approximate size of the navies now at war, when the war opened.

Since the beginning of the war nearly all the combatants have added some new vessels, but no details of these are known.

As soon as the war began Great Britain began a blockade of the German coast and bottled up by so doing the main German battle fleet then at aid with several vessels on the east coast of England, but except for the regrettable casualties this also was without effect on the general situation. The naval campaigns so far indicate that the day of the battleship, in any of its forms, is passing, and that the day of the submarine, either working alone or in conjunction with some one of the varied forms of aircraft, is coming in.

The exploits of the Emden and the Karlsruhe also seem to point to the great importance of swift commerce destroyers in naval wars, where the enemy is possessed of a large merchant-ship marine.

THE report of the chairman of the military committee of the French Chamber of Deputies shows that from the experience of the French military hospitals with several hundred thousand wounded, the mortality has only been 2.48 per cent. This is not one-sixth of what the rate was in our civil war, and is far lower than obtained in the Franco-Prussian war of 1870, or even the Boer war in South Africa. Nothing can be more confirmatory of the advance in medical science than this extraordinarily low death rate. The rate in the British hospitals will probably be even lower, as these are said to be better equipped and better managed than the French. Many of the medical lessons of this war will hereafter be put in practice for the amelioration of the sufferings of ordinary humanity in everyday life, particularly in the sphere of preventive medicine.

Lack of space will this week again make the review of the actual events of the several fighting lines a summary, but except in the east there has been nothing of much importance to chronicle.

One fact has come to my attention which is worth noting as showing the severe character of the fighting on the western battle line at the end of October and the early part of November. The first battalion of the Irish Guards went into action on the morning of the 31st of October 1,105 strong. They fought that day and on November 1 and 7, and in those three days lost 713 of their effective. Other regiments, and many of them, suffered as heavily. These figures will bring home better than any description would the savagery of the conflict. On this western line of battle the result of the week's fighting has been practically nil, though the fighting has been at points very severe. On the extreme western end from Lille to the Channel the Allies have made a determined effort to advance, which has had some measure of success, but it must be remembered that every obstacle that either courage or science could put in the way has been interposed, so that the advance can be measured in yards only, and it will probably take weeks for the advance, if continued, to show appreciably on the map. This

From Lille eastward the combats have been less severe until the region of the Argonne and Verdun is reached. In this intermediate region there have been intermittent duels and occasional infantry attacks, but on the whole in these trenches the week has been very quiet.

In the Argonne and Verdun districts, however, the fighting has been very severe, and as a result the losses very heavy. It has been a continual succession of hand-to-hand struggles and mining operations, culminating in the blowing up of the enemies' trenches and an unrelenting shelling of the enemies' positions. The results achieved have been very insignificant as we see them from this distance, but may be of more importance than they seem. The main and strategic positions are, however, apparently entirely unchanged.

General Joffre, the French commander-in-chief, has during the past three weeks relieved, according to an official statement, some twenty-one French generals of their commands, some on account of age, which made it difficult for them to stand the fatigues of the campaign, others on account of incompetency. These changes will, no doubt, make for efficiency.

The Turko-Russian campaign drags. The Allies continue the bombardment of the Dardanelles; in fact, there is at the end of the week an unverified rumor that they have succeeded in forcing the strait.

During the week England has proclaimed a protectorate over Egypt and has deposed the Khedive. There are a good many territorialists as well as native Indian troops in Egypt, sent there to take the place of the British regulars, withdrawn for use on the European battle line. So far, the Turkish movement against Egypt has not materialized.

The South African rebellion is definitely and finally crushed; over 5,000 of the rebels have surrendered and there are only a comparatively few still at large. In East Africa there has been some severe fighting. This assertion is based on the casualty lists, which are large; the results, however, we do not know.

But one thing remains to be considered: the German campaign in Poland. In North Poland, between advance has been greatest at Nieuport and at Ypres.

During the week the Germans have also been busily engaged in fortifying the Belgian coast towns north of Nieuport which are in their possession. While so engaged they have been bombarded from time to time by the British fleet of monitors, but with immaterial results. Heavy siege guns are being brought up and placed in a strongly fortified position. There seems to be a double object in this: first, to use these towns as bases for defense against a further allied land advance, and second, to use the armament to defend the coast against British naval attack.

MAJORITY VOTE FOR PROHIBITION IN CONGRESS

TUESDAY, December 22, 1914, will go down in American history as the date on which the resolution proposing the adoption of an amendment to the federal constitution, prohibiting the manufacture, sale, transportation, importation and exportation of intoxicating liquors, received a majority vote of the members of the House of Representatives present at the session. Notwithstanding this remarkable showing, the measure was defeated because a two-thirds vote is required for a resolution proposing an amendment to the constitution. The vote was 197 for and 189 against the resolution. Only sixty-one votes were lacking of the required two-thirds.

It is a long time since the House of Representatives has been the scene of so much excitement, animation and enthusiasm as marked the proceedings of this eventful day. The galleries were packed, almost exclusively by friends of prohibition, fervent temperance addresses were made from the floor of the House, which were replied to with almost equal fervor by members opposed to the measure. The chamber was decorated with placards proclaiming the evils of alcohol. Along the south gallery hung a petition signed by twelve thousand societies, representing six million people, praying Congress to submit the prohibitory amendment to the states.

The battle of oratory waged for ten hours, under the leadership of Representative Richmond Pearson Hobson of Alabama, who proposed the resolution. In the course of his remarks Mr. Hobson said:

"When the great war in Europe is over it will be found that the sum total killed on the field of battle for all nations will average less than fifteen hundred a day. Alcohol averages two thousand a day.

"When the fact is established that opium and cocaine and other drugs are poisonous no question has ever been raised as to the power and the right of the federal government and the states to co-operate in the suppression of the popular distribution of those drugs.

"Starting at twenty, a young man as a total abstainer can live to be sixty-five; as a moderate drinker he will die at fifty-one. Do not talk to us about temperance when it will cut fourteen and a half years out of the life of the average man, though he never gets drunk in his life. It will cause the heavy drinker to die at thirty-five, cutting thirty years out of his short life. Children of drinking parents die at the rate of from four to five times as many as those of abstaining parents in the ages when they ought to be protected.

"The organizations composing the liquor trust collect two and one-half billions of dollars from the American people every year. In this way nearly two-thirds of all the money in circulation in America in the course of a year passes into the hands of the liquor trust.

"Alcohol actually kills fully seven hundred thousand American citizens every year."

Mr. Hobson pointed out that fifty-six per cent. of all the people of the United States already live under prohibition laws. Of all the territory in the United States on the North American continent seventy-eight per cent. is dry. Fourteen states have statewide prohibition and five more are expected to become dry in 1918.

Party lines were forgotten in the fight on the prohibition measure, both

Mr. Underwood, Democratic leader, and Mr. Mann, Republican leader, antagonizing the resolution. Mr. Underwood spoke of the loss from an economic standpoint entailed by the forfeiture of $325,000,000 yearly revenue on alcoholic drinks paid to the government. He also declared that "prohibition does not prohibit," citing the fact that there were eight hundred cases of "bootlegging" last year in prohibition Georgia. Mr. Mann, as well as Mr. Underwood, objected to the measure on the ground that it was outside the province of the federal government and must be controlled by the states themselves. Representative Heflin of Alabama also opposed the measure on the ground that the regulation of alcohol should be entrusted to the states.

Representative Garrett of Texas, speaking for the resolution and addressing the northern members of the house, said: "You took our negroes away from us at the time of the war. That was confiscation of property, but it was confiscation in a good cause. I do not see why any one should object to the confiscation of saloon property."

Representative Campbell, speaking for the measure, referred to the address made by Emperor William to his troops in 1907 in which he urged them to avoid the use of intoxicating liquors, and of the recent ukase of the Czar of Russia, prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors. Mr. Campbell said that most of the poverty, pauperism, insanity, divorces and murders were traceable to the use of alcoholic stimulants.

Representative Lindquist of Michigan said: "The destructive wars of Europe would never wreck the future progress of the nation as can the curse which we are fighting here today."

The placards which Mr. Hobson had placed at different points throughout the house bore such legends as these:

"Crime is caused by drink."
"Liquor fills the asylums."
"Child death rate higher in drinker's family."

"Alcohol has more victims than tuberculosis."

"Drinking mothers lose more than half their babies; sober mothers less than one-fourth."

A member of the House looked up the rules and discovered that the display of placards was forbidden. He brought this fact to the attention of the speaker with the result that the pages gathered up the score or more of placards on exhibition and removed them from the chamber.

The leaders of the prohibition forces at Washington, Representative Hobson and Dr. Dinwiddie of the Anti-Saloon League, are being warmly praised for their campaign, which has resulted in so fine a showing for the advocates of prohibition.

The New York Evening Mail, commenting upon the vote, declared: "Certainly the country was startled today. At breakfast tables all over the land there was amazement at the size of the vote in Congress for prohibition. The composition of the vote was tremendously significant. Constituencies typically American were generally in the aye column. Districts in which special local conditions were favorable to the liquor business made up the opposition. Studying the vote from this angle, remembering that in the long run the predominant sentiment of the American prevails in national legislation, it must be admitted that the test of strength yesterday portends national prohibition."

The United States of the World

By Dr. Frank Crane

WE ARE coming, Uncle Woodrow, ten hundred thousand strong!

From all over this land, from California and Texas, from Maine and Florida, petitions are pouring in to Congress, to the Senate and to the President of the United States, urging them to propose at once some constructive program for the United Government of the World.

Will they do it? It depends upon you. Write now to your congressman and to the President, no matter who you are, man, woman or child, rich or poor, important or unknown. This ought to be the most universal, popular appeal ever known.

One hundred and thirty-eight years ago, America thrilled the world by issuing its Declaration of Independence, a document that is one of the landmarks of history. It is now time that we give forth another declaration, even more significant, the "Declaration of Interdependence."

We do not expect that all nations will join with us at once. We do not imagine we shall attain perfection at a leap. But we can BEGIN.

"All beginnings are difficult," says the proverb. It takes courage, vision, faith to begin. Have not the people of the United States of America these qualities?

Do not allow your mind to be side-tracked by the many details and difficulties that may be suggested. Anybody can point out the snags in the way. It will be said: "How can we get other nations to enter in? What will be the form, manner and details of the agreement?" And so forth, and so forth.

These things can be left to the practical wisdom of the statesmen. What is needed now is to commit them to the GREAT PRINCIPLE and to the PRESENT OPPORTUNITY of beginning to put it in force.

Christians are sending missionaries to foreign lands. What single move can compare with World Government, the laying down of arms, in its influence upon distant countries?

With how much more force would the Gospel come to the non-Christian peoples if the Christian nations would cease to threaten with gunboats, and would stand nationally for law, order, co-operation and justice, instead of brute force! What progress can we make if with our left hand we offer the program of Christ, while our right hand is a mailed fist?

The campaign for World Government is on. It is not a peace idea, it is a militant idea. But we fight not strangers of another land, with whom we have no quarrel in the world, but we fight the old, dead ideas that for centuries have gripped and terrorized the world. "We wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of world-darkness, against spiritual wickedness in high places."

It is not enough for us to be neutral, to be peaceful, to stand aside and be but onlookers. We must come to the rescue of the world with a vigorous, practical, redemptive plan.

This plan cannot come from statesmen or diplomats. It must originate among the people. It must be a great, irresistible, universal demand.

It is a movement in which women, even more than men, ought to be interested. The woman half of the world is politically silent. Men fight battles and are cheered on by the enthusiasm of struggle. They wear the gilded uniforms. For them bands play. But it is the women that in darkness bear the bitter brunt. Wives and mothers in Belgium now are homeless, starved.

And think of the women now sitting by cold firesides in England, Germany, France, Russia, Austria and Serbia, waiting for dreaded news!

Women of America, you have something clear, definite, workable that you can do. Get your church society or your women's club to petition your congressman at once to work for World Federation. The greatest men in America are agreed.

Andrew Carnegie says: "The cure for war is the establishment of a world-wide organization with as many peaceful powers as possible."

Oscar S. Straus declares: "This can only be possible under a universal alliance."

Josiah Strong says: "World Federation is practicable, and, I am confident, is coming. It must take the form suggested by the United States of America—a United States of the World. Our Nation of States affords a working model for Kant's 'State of Nations.'"

Frederic C. Howe, commissioner of immigration of New York, says: "The United States, from her position of commanding influence, is the nation to promote such a federation."

Edward Alston Ross, president American Sociological Society, says: "There appears to be no middle ground between federation and the ruin of the civilization of the white race."

Charles E. Jefferson, pastor of the Broadway Tabernacle, New York: "I am quite clear in my mind that World Federation must come, and that Christian men ought to do all in their power to bring it about."

John Haynes Holmes, pastor of the Church of the Messiah, New York, says: "It is either federation, or it is chaos and black night. This it is which makes the present situation the most stupendous crisis in history."

David Starr Jordan: "The United States is particularly fitted, as a democratic nation looked to by all the democratic peoples in Europe as a model and an inspiration, to take the first step in forming a world alliance."

At first an American proposal for World Federation may be received with indifference, perhaps with scorn and ridicule by the contending European nations. Men in a street brawl hardly listen to reason. But by and by the warring states will wear themselves out. They cannot go on spending billions of dollars and sacrificing millions of lives a year. They will reach the limit of endurance.

Whichever side wins, the results will be colossal ruin. Then they will listen to our proposition, BECAUSE THERE WILL BE NOTHING ELSE FOR THEM TO DO. They cannot drop back into the old system of military preparedness. That would mean intolerable burdens placed upon a populace already bankrupt; it would mean still fiercer rivalries, and eventually another war.

You, however humble you may be, can do your part to cure the hurt of the world. We lay it upon your conscience, in the name of Christ our Master. Will you do your duty in this great war against war?

Go to the editor of your newspaper and urge him to advocate the Federation of the World.

Induce your Chamber of Commerce or Business Men's Association to petition the President.

Copy the brief petition which follows, have it signed by your neighbors and forward it to your congressman with your own personal appeal.

These things you can do, and you shall not be without your reward.

PETITION

We, the undersigned, respectfully petition you as our representative in Congress to use all your influence to induce the United States of America now to propose the United States of the World, in such manner as your wisdom may direct.

A Thought for 1915

WITH the passing of the old year, the clouds of depression are perceptibly lifting. Already we may see the bright gleams striking through in shafts of silver. The old year has become a part of the history of the dead past, while 1915, new, fresh, vigorous, is a living issue, full of hope and promise. Let us begin it with resolute confidence in the wisdom of the overruling Father. Let us count our blessings and show our appreciation of God's goodness to us as a nation, at a time when there is so much stress and struggle in the outside world. On every hand we see indications pointing to industrial and commercial revival. Our bumper crops, our steadily growing export trade, our banks everywhere sound and equipped with a system better adapted to mercantile and commercial needs than before—there is surely abundant cause for confidence in the business world. But there are reasons that appeal even more pertinently to the individual, the community, the nation. We are enjoying the paramount blessing of peace; panic, pestilence and disaster have mercifully passed us by. The year just begun can be all that we desire if we only strive to deserve the best work for the best, look for the best. Let us therefore take hold with courage and confidence, knowing that when all the turmoil is past, we shall look back on the days of our doubts and misgivings with something akin to surprise that we ever should have questioned the future. And so, "believing all things, hoping all things, enduring all things," and firmly grounded in faith and confidence in God's goodness let us go forward with our work for 1915.

The Handwriting on the Wall

A MONSTER petition, representing 1,200 organizations and six million Americans, ran along the walls of the House of Representatives while, on December 22, 1914, a day henceforth to be memorable in American history the forces of prohibition won their preliminary victory in Congress. Technically the vote meant defeat for prohibition. But literally it was a real victory. For the poll showed that a majority of the members present voted for prohibition. The necessity of a two-thirds vote prevented the victory of the proposition to submit the prohibition amendment to the states, but with this magnificent showing at the first engagement the armies of prohibition can be absolutely certain that the day of final and complete victory is near at hand.

The claim that the amendment usurps for the federal government powers which belong to individual states is a mere quibble. A traffic which brings in $230,000,000 in federal revenue is certainly a federal matter. A traffic which kills seven hundred thousand American citizens every year is a federal issue. A measure which has already received the favorable vote of more than half the members of the House of Representatives in one of the most important sessions of that body's history is a federal measure.

American democracy will accomplish in a few years what Russian autocracy has just accomplished in a few days. The very principles of democracy will compel the enactment of the eighteenth amendment. Regrets that the measure was defeated this year are almost lost sight of in joy at the overwhelming demonstration of the fact that the day of nation-wide prohibition is near at hand. "The voice of the people is the voice of God."

To Our Readers

IN ACCORDANCE with its usual custom at this season of the year, the Christian Herald invites the expression of its readers' preferences as to the various departments of their favorite paper. We ask all of our friends to read the list below and that each should send us by an early mail a postal card, indicating the departments in the order of their personal choice, marked "1, 2, 3," etc. Such a vote from the members of our Family Circle will be very helpful to us in determining the comparative value and usefulness of the departments. We would be pleased to have as large a vote on the choice of departments as possible, and we thank our readers in advance for their co-operation in this effort looking to the general improvement of the paper. The departments on which you are asked to vote are these, marking through any that fail to interest you:

Missionaries in Trouble

THE PROTESTANT MISSIONARIES in Palestine are facing many hardships as a result of the war. Since Turkish mobilization began food has been growing scarcer and higher. American citizens and American missionaries have been treated with consideration, but the native Christian population and the Jews are suffering many hardships. Mr. Forster, the well-known missionary, whose Eastern travels and Gospel work have been frequently referred to in the Christian Herald, is under arrest charged with having included in his letters to a missionary board in England references to legal and military affairs to which the government took exception.

Successful Toy Flying Machine

WHAT boy will ever forget, to his last day, the joy felt at the pull of the kite on the string that has taken two or three balls of twine, and looks no larger than a hand far up in the sky? The fliers of kites are green with envy now at the boys who have toy aeroplanes. An eighteen-year-old boy in a city of Michigan, who made three dollars a month at odd tasks out of school hours, learned how to make a heavier-than-air device, with a rubber motor, that can fly a mile high. He makes the toy himself and it is so popular that he is said to have an income of $5,000 a year from it. He says that his first object in making the money is to put himself through college or a technical school, and he believes he will have a sufficient amount for that purpose in two years. This boy is a good example to the rest of the boys of the country, in his keenness of perception, in his careful investigation, in his intense application, and especially in his laudable ambition to secure a higher education that he may come to the most there is in him, and the most the world may require of him. In his determination to turn his money into mental and moral treasure, he is obedient to this command of the wise man: "Wisdom is the principal thing; therefore get wisdom; and with all thy getting get understanding." (Prov. 4: 7.)

British Flag in Egypt

ON DECEMBER 18, 1914, England took the protectorate of Egypt from Turkey as a war measure and appointed Prince Hussein Kemal sultan. The prince is an uncle of Abbas Hilmi, who was deposed as sultan because of his pronounced friendliness to Turkey. Sir Arthur Henry McMahon was appointed the king's high commissioner for the protectorate. Egypt, while nominally forming part of the Turkish Empire, has in the past been virtually a dependency of England. King George sent to the new ruler the following message: "I offer you my congratulations and assurances of support and confidence in securing the well-being and prosperity of Egypt." The new sultan in his proclamation said: "I accept the British invitation to become sultan of Egypt with a full sense of my responsibility and will faithfully fulfil my sacred duties. I believe there is a great future for my country, once the disturbance caused by the war is over." France recognized the English suzerainty of Egypt. The ancient nation, once the dominant empire of the world, with the most brilliant civilization known, thus becomes a province of Great Britain. This is the country out of which the slave race came to become God's family, to found his kingdom in the earth. This is the country into which the Babe of Bethlehem was carried to escape the fury of the murderous king. "When he arose, he took the young child and his mother by night, and departed into Egypt, and was there until the death of Herod." (Matt. 2: 14, 15.)

Sells Ring for Missions

AT THE Baptist State Convention of North Carolina, held at Raleigh recently, this touching incident occurred: A letter was received by the treasurer of the convention from a young woman of the Training School at Louisville, whose name, at her own request, was withheld. The letter said: "I am sending you with this a ring, which I hope you can dispose of and use the proceeds for the work of state missions. I have tried here but have been unable to dispose of it and am very anxious for it to go that way. I will appreciate it if you will do this and say nothing about it more than is necessary to sell it." When the convention heard the letter read a motion was passed that the convention purchase the ring, taking a voluntary offering for the purpose, applying the collection to state missions, and instruct the treasurer to return the ring to the young woman as a gift from the convention. The offering taken amounted to $90. The convention sent the young woman a communication, expressing its appreciation of her gift. We have in this incident a token of the loyalty and love woman has ever had for her Lord. There was sacrifice in the gift. She saw the pressing need of money; she did not have it, but she did have the ring. It may have been rich with memories. It may have been the symbol of a sacred earthly love. It may have been worn by the hand of one who had vanished. Whatever history the ring had, she loved her Master better than all and gladly gave it to promote his kingdom. Of just such woman's love as this the Saviour said: "Whosoever this Gospel shall be preached in the whole world, there shall also this, that this woman hath done, be told for a memorial of her." (Matt. 26: 13.)

BILLY SUNDAY'S PHILADELPHIA TABERNACLE

WHEN Evangelist Billy Sunday makes engagements for his spiritual campaigns he makes it one of the conditions that a place be constructed for the meetings under the direction of his own architect. The greatest of all, the Billy Sunday tabernacles is the one just being completed in Philadelphia. It is a mammoth structure, capable of seating 20,000 people, and it will be crowded to the doors twice a day. The meetings will continue for ten weeks from January 3. It is expected that Philadelphia will be shaken religiously as it has never been before. Some will not agree with Sunday's theology; some will be offended at his "shame," and shocked by his rough figures of speech; but if men and women are saved and Satan's kingdom suffers defeat, all the rest is of little consequence. In this generation, there has perhaps appeared no one man who has struck the forces of moral evil such terrific blows as this fearless soldier of the Cross. His keen knowledge of the world and of human nature, his intense love for his Saviour and his fellow men, and his inveterate hatred of wrong, are some of the human elements in his success. Recognizing the enormity of sin and the efficacy of faith in a crucified Saviour, this evangelist continues the message of Peter on the day of Pentecost: "Repent and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost." (Act. 2: 38.)

Sings at Own Funeral

AFTER the Masons had conducted the funeral service of Mr. Len G. Spencer, a phonograph was rolled beside the bier. Mr. Spencer in his will had decreed that two records should be played at his funeral, and suddenly there sounded through the room the dead man's voice, chanting the Lord's Prayer and the Twenty-third Psalm. The widow and two daughters had known in advance of Mr. Spencer's plan, but to the others it came as a surprise, which moved most of them to tears. The wife and daughters listened for hours to the records that echoed the voice of their dear one. Then, in accordance with the wish expressed in the will, the records were locked up and will not be played again for ten years. It will not be necessary, however, to have a phonograph to repeat the voices of the dead. The homes in which we dwell, the occupations that engage our hands, the circle in which we move, the temples in which we worship, the hovels of poverty we aid, the chambers of the sick we visit, all are records that repeat our voices and influence while we are living and after we shall have passed from this earthly scene. The children would never be much more lonesome than they are if they did not hear in the daytime, and oftener in the stillness of the night, the voice of the sainted mother in the blessed words of love she used when here, in the cradle-song and the hymns of comfort and of heaven, and in the prayers of "Our Father which art in heaven," and "Now I lay me down to sleep." Life is a phonograph and its records will be repeated to the end of time. Of what supreme importance is it that we say something worth saying, do something worth doing, have our hearts full of love, our hands full of service, our souls full of Christ's joy, which is heaven! The use of the phonograph at the funeral and the immortality of good deeds remind us of these words: "He being dead yet speaketh." (Heb. 11: 4.)

GEORGE W. BECK and J. W. Ransom, two of the four oveland travelers who began their famous State House ride at Olympia, Wash., May 1, 1912, have reached Medicine Lodge, Kan., on their way from Oklahoma City to Denver. By June 1, 1915, they will have traveled through every state in the Union and will enter San Francisco with at least one of the original starting horses. For accomplishing this record-breaking feat they are to receive a large purse from the Northwestern Stockmen's Association. They have already traveled 17,000 miles. This 20,000-mile overland journey is a reminder of the wagon transportation in the west before the railroads were built. Now a man could go by rail from Washington State, visit every state and enter San Francisco in as few weeks as it will take years for the four men to complete their journey. In our time we are going at a swift pace on the journey of life into the regions of material, mental and moral improvement and service, not to return to the place from where we started, but to continue in another realm the enjoyments and companionships of which are symbolized by these words of Moses: "We are journeying into the place of which the Lord said, I will give it you; come thou with us and we will do thee good." (Num. 10: 29.)

Wilson Memorial

AMONG other monuments to Mrs. Woodrow Wilson is a ship's library. The American Seamen's Friend Society recently received a gift of money to be applied to the purchase of books for a library for the use of American sailors. Carefully selected volumes have been bought and are now on a deep-water ship. The loan libraries of the American Seamen's Friend Society have been going to sea for the greater part of a century. The society, which is putting into service these Wilson memorial books, has done benevolent work for the sailors which has been known in almost every port throughout the world. What a beautiful thought it was to furnish books for the boys on the sea, who in times of quietness and relaxation have the leisure as well as the disposition to read them! How appropriate to employ this gift of books as a memorial to one whose intellectual ability, social culture, deep sympathy and practical benevolence are themselves a memorial in the hearts of the people of this country! What a fitting memorial in every respect is the library provided for the men "that go down to the sea in ships." (Ps. 107: 24.)

Plant Trammels Electric Wires

THE electric wires of Porto Rico are seriously obstructed by a plant that does not anchor itself to the earth with its roots, but settles on the wires and derives its life from the air. The winds, or birds, or insects convey the seeds from which the plant springs. Parasites in the vegetable and animal realm are a low form of life. There are parasites in the social realm who get their living with as little work as possible, leaning on and fastening themselves to others for their support. There are some parasites in the church who are willing that others should do their praying, or paying, or both. To such God's word speaks plainly: "Work out your own salvation." (Phil. 2: 12.)

THE RETURN OF POLLYANNA

BY ELEANOR H. PORTER

SYNOPSIS OF WHAT HAS TAKEN PLACE: Mrs. Carew, a rich Boston woman, lives almost as a recluse in sorrow over the disappearance, years ago, of a little nephew Jamie. Her sister, Miss Wetherby, was Pollyanna's nurse during her stay at the Sanatorium where she was so wonderfully brought back to health and strength by Dr. Ames after her accident. Miss Wetherby persuades Mrs. Carew to invite Pollyanna to spend the winter with her, feeling sure that the result will be her restoration to happiness. Letters from Miss Wetherby and Dr. Ames persuade Dr. and Mrs. Chilton to let Pollyanna go, they themselves planning to spend the winter in Europe. Pollyanna is greatly delighted with Mrs. Carew's magnificent home on Commonwealth Avenue and with all that she sees of Boston. At the end of her first week she strays into the Public Garden, where by her conversation and her description of "the glad game" she starts an ex-convict toward a useful life and saves a young woman from temptation. Leaving the park, Pollyanna wanders in the wrong direction, loses her way, is rescued and brought home by a little newsboy. Some weeks later she meets her newsboy friend, Jerry, in the Public Garden. He has just wheeled up a little lame boy, his adopted brother, to spend the day in the park. Pollyanna learns that the boy's name is James; that his father is dead, and he cannot remember his name; that he loved books, some of which James still owns and reads. She is confident that he is the lost Jamie.]

"POOH! there's nothing to know," rejoined the boy, with a shrug. "Besides, see, here's poor Sir Lancelot and all the rest, waiting for their dinner," he finished.

"Dear me, so they are," sighed Pollyanna, glancing at the fluttering and chattering creatures all about them. Recklessly she turned her bag upside down and scattered her supplies to the four winds. "There, now, that's done, and we can talk again," she rejoiced. "And there's such a lot I want to know. First, please, what is your name? I only know it isn't 'Sir James.'"

The boy smiled.

"No, it isn't; but that's what Jerry 'most always calls me. Mumsey and the rest call me 'Jamie.'"

"'Jamie!'" Pollyanna caught her breath and held it suspended. A wild hope had come to her eyes. It was followed almost instantly, however, by fearful doubt.

"Does 'mumsey' mean—mother?"

"Sure!"

"Pollyanna relaxed visibly. Her face fell. If this Jamie had a mother he could not, of course, be Mrs. Carew's Jamie, whose mother had died long ago. Still, even as he was, he was wonderfully interesting.

"But where do you live?" she catechized eagerly. "Is there anybody else in your family but your mother and—Jerry? Do you always come here every day? Where is your Jolly Book? Mayn't I see it? Don't the doctors say you can ever walk again? And where was it you said you got it?—this wheel chair, I mean."

The boy chuckled.

"Say, how many of them questions do you expect me to answer all at once? I'll begin at the last one, anyhow, and work backwards, maybe, if I don't forget what they be. I got this chair a year ago. Jerry knew one of them fellers what writes for papers, you know, and he put it in about me—how I couldn't ever walk, and all that, and—and the Jolly Book, you see. The first thing I knew a whole lot of men and women come one day, toting this chair, and said 'twas for me. That they'd read all about me, and they wanted me to have it to remember them by."

"My! how glad you must have been!"

"I was. It took a whole page of my Jolly Book to tell about that chair."

"But can't you ever walk again?" Pollyanna's eyes were blurred with tears.

"It don't look like it. They said I couldn't."

"Oh, but that's what they said about me, and then they sent me to Dr. Ames, and I stayed 'most a year; and he made me walk. Maybe he could you!"

The boy shook his head.

"He couldn't—you see, I couldn't go to him, anyway. 'Twould cost too much. We'll just have to call it that I can't ever—walk again. But never mind." The boy threw back his head impatiently. "I'm trying not to think of that. You know what it is when—when your think gets to going."

"Yes, yes, of course—and here I am talking about it! cried Pollyanna, penitently. "I said you know how to play the game better than I did, now. But six. That's when they took me, you see."

"And your name is Jamie?" Pollyanna was holding her breath.

"Why, yes, I told you that."

"And what's the other name?" Longingly, but fearfully, Pollyanna asked this question.

"I don't know."

"You don't know!"

"I don't remember. I was too little, I suppose. Even the Murphys don't know. They never knew me as anything but Jamie."

A great disappointment came to not wanted him, either. She was determined that she would not make the same mistake a third time; so very promptly now she assumed an air of elaborate indifference on this most dangerous subject, as she said:

"But never mind about Jamie Kent. Tell me about yourself. I'm so interested!"

"There isn't anything to tell. I don't know anything nice," hesitated the boy. "They said father was—was queer, and never talked. They didn't even know his name. Everybody called him 'the Professor.' Mumsey says he and I lived in a little back room on the top floor of the house in Lowell where they used to live. They were poor then, but they wasn't near so poor as they are now. Jerry's father was alive them days, and had a job."

"Yes, yes, go on," prompted Pollyanna.

"Well, mumsey says my father was sick a lot, and he got queerer and queerer, so that they had me downstairs with them a good deal. I could walk then, a little, but my legs wasn't right. I played with Jerry and the little girl that died. Well, when father died there wasn't anybody to take me, and some men were goin' to put me in an orphan asylum; but mumsey says I took on so, and Jerry took on so, that they said they'd keep me. And they did. The little girl had just died, and they said I might take her place. And they've had me ever since. And I fell and got worse, and they're awful poor now, too, besides Jerry's father dyin'. But they've kept me. Now, ain't that what you call bein' pretty good to a feller?"

"Yes, oh, yes!" cried Pollyanna. "But they'll get their reward—I know they'll get their reward!" Pollyanna was quivering with delight now. The last doubt had fled. She had found the lost Jamie. She was sure of it. But not yet must she speak. First, Mrs. Carew must see him. Then—then!—Even Pollyanna's imagination failed when it came to picturing the bliss in store for Mrs. Carew and Jamie at that glad reunion.

She sprang lightly to her feet, in utter disregard of Sir Lancelot, who had come back and was nosing in her lap for more nuts.

"I've got to go now, but I'll come again tomorrow. Maybe I'll have a lady with me that you'll like to know. You'll be here tomorrow, won't you?" she finished anxiously.

"Sure, if it's pleasant. Jerry totes me up here 'most every mornin'. They fixed it so he could, you know; and I bring my dinner and stay till four o'clock. Jerry's good to me—he is!"

"I know, I know," nodded Pollyanna. "And maybe you'll find somebody else to be good to you, too," she caroled. With which cryptic statement and a beaming smile she was gone.

SHE LIFTED HER CHIN AND SQUARELY FACED MRS. CAREW go on. You haven't told me half yet. Where do you live? And is Jerry all the brothers and sisters you've got?"

A swift change came to the boy's face. His eyes glowed.

"Yes—and he ain't mine, really. He ain't any relation, nor mumsey ain't, neither. And only think how good they've been to me!"

"What's that?" questioned Pollyanna, instantly on the alert. "Isn't that—that 'mumsey' your mother at all?"

"No; and that's what makes"—

"And haven't you got any mother?" interrupted Pollyanna, in growing excitement.

"No, I never remember any mother, and father died six years ago."

"How old were you?"

"I don't know. I was little. Mumsey says she guesses maybe I was about Pollyanna's face, but almost immediately a flash of thought drove the shadow away.

"Well, anyhow, if you don't know what your name is you can't know it isn't 'Kent!'" she exclaimed.

"'Kent?'" puzzled the boy.

"Yes," began Pollyanna, all excitement. "You see, there was a little boy named Jamie Kent—" She stopped abruptly and bit her lip. It had occurred to Pollyanna that it would be kinder not to let this boy know yet of her hope that he might be the lost Jamie. It would be better that she make sure of it before raising any expectations, otherwise she might be bringing him sorrow rather than joy. She had not forgotten how disappointed Jimmy Bean had been when she had been obliged to tell him that the Ladies' Aid did not want him, and again when at first Mr. Pendleton had

PLANS AND PLOTTINGS

On the way home Pollyanna made joyous plans. Tomorrow, in some way or other, Mrs. Carew must be persuaded to go with her for a walk in the Public Garden. Just how this was to be brought about Pollyanna did not know, but brought about it must be.

To tell Mrs. Carew plainly that she had found Jamie and wanted her to go and see him was out of the question. There was, of course, a bare chance that this might not be her Jamie; and if it were not, and if she had thus raised in Mrs. Carew false hopes, the result might be disastrous. Pollyanna knew, from what Mary had told her, that twice already Mrs. Carew had been made very ill by the great disappointment of following alluring clues that had led to some boy very

A SUGGESTION TO CONGRESS. In view of the returns now complete under the income tax law—$57,598 individuals paying $28,253,525 income tax into the federal treasury—it would not be a move in the direction of a permanently increased revenue to enact a law requiring corporations and others to pay all employees salaries of $2,500 and over so that said employees would have to pay an income tax.

Some of the income classifications in the report of the commissioner of internal revenue are far from overcrowded, as the following will show: Individuals receiving a net income of $1,000,000 and over, 44; $500,000 to $1,000,000, 91; $250,000 to $500,000, 222; $100,000 to $250,000, 1,241; $75,000 to $100,000, 998; $50,000 to $75,000, 2,681; $40,000 to $50,000, 2,427; $30,000 to $40,000, 4,552; $25,000 to $30,000, 4,164; $20,000 to $25,000, 6,817; $15,000 to $20,000, 11,977; $10,000 to $15,000, 26,818; $5,000 to $10,000, 101,718; $3,333 to $5,000, 114,181; $2,500 to $3,333, 79,426. The tax upon incomes over $20,000 amounted to $15,725,497. There were 278,835 married persons, 55,212 single men and 21,551 single women on the lists. Corporations—the number of 316,209 paid tax on an aggregate income of $339,550,008, that income approximately 7 per cent. on the total capital of over six billion dollars. From all sources the bureau received for the fiscal year ending last June $80,008,801, the largest income in its history; for the ensuing fiscal year the estimates are: total, $429,000,000; net tax, $1,000,000; income tax, $80,000,000.

EMPEROR OF AUSTRIA REPORTED DYING. The rumor has appeared at different times since the war broke out that Emperor Francis Joseph of Austria-Hungary was at the point of death, and the rumor has again appeared in the press of December 24 in a despatch from Rome that states that the emperor has received the last sacraments.

GETTING BACK TO AN OLD MAXIM. The hope of this country lies in teaching the young idea how to shoot, according to some among the prominent men who have organized a national security league, with the object of creating a national demand for an increase in our military and naval strength as a necessary preparation against a time of war. It is advocated that 3,000 educated men be enlisted and trained as army officers, who later shall supervise our "military reserve." Congress is to be asked to authorize the issuance of a special loan of $100,000,000 in bonds at three and one half per cent., the proceeds to be devoted to perfecting our defenses. The teaching of the use of firearms in the public schools and colleges is one proposed feature of the new order.

HALF-HEARTED SABBATH IN PANAMA. The national emblem of the republic of Panama is understood to have enacted a Sunday law which imposes a heavy fine for keeping shops open on that day, but permits saloons to continue doing business.

A STABLE DOOR THAT IS STILL UNLOCKED. The irritating human trait of procrastination, which has so often left the door open for robbers of our most prized possessions, seems responsible for what may yet prove to be costly delay in bringing to an effective focus the efforts to devise war and peace for increasing safety at sea, begun with much delay of determination after the wreck of the Titanic, and stimulated by recent marine disasters. It is now stated in the press that a group of senators are vigorously opposing consideration by Congress of the bill to ratify the convention signed by the delegates to the London Safety-at-Sea Conference, a conference initiated by our government. It is stated the contention is made that the proposals in that convention actually operate against safety at sea. The President, Secretary Brown and other influential members of the administration and of Congress have advocated the prompt ratification of the convention since the bill was introduced. The ratification by the Senate of the convention carrying an amendment reserving to the United States the right to impose higher standards of health and safety than those named in the convention will, in the opinion of the President, according to report, prevent the final exchange of ratifications between the maritime powers.

SUFFER THE LITTLE CHILDREN TO GO TO WORK. According to the National Child Labor Committee there are still 21 states which legalize the employment of children under 14 years of age in mills and factories. A conference on the general subject has been called in Washington for January 5 and 6 to advance the movement for a federal child labor law that will enforce a 14-year limit throughout the country.

THE CHRISTMAS SEASON IN MEXICO. The present holiday season is being observed in Mexico as usual. There seems to be very little of the spectacular about the present state of war in that country, and efforts to inject into the news a color of real war fails to produce the desired effect. So far as can be gathered from reports, Mexico is in the midst of a mammoth political outbreak in which there is a display of firearms and swords, and some real fighting with regrettable fatalities. But as to dignity and plan there seems to be none. It is even questioned if the present leaders know what they want for Mexico as a nation, though it is quite probable that they know what they want for themselves. Accounts of battles and of changing moods in the different aspirants for the presidency are indefinite and unreliable.

CHINA ADVANCING BACKWARDS. Press despatches report that on December 23 President Yuan Shi Kai, in accordance with orders from the administrative council prescribing the worship of heaven and of Confucius by the president of China, worshiped before the altar of heaven with ancient ceremonies, wearing the robes of the high dukes, which were designed in 1122 B.C., and thereby, according to the general understanding, re-established Confucianism as the state religion.

MASSACHUSETTS ABOLISHES ACCIDENTS. A new organization, the Massachusetts No-Accident League, has been formed to bring about legislation that will make the streets and roads of that state safe at all times through the installation of lights at road intersections, the creation of safety zones for pedestrians, the posting of policemen at the right spots. Not entirely new in method, perhaps, but new in resolve, as is fitting at the start of a new year.

TO MAKE LONDON BEHAVE. Whether there is a military or a suffragette significance is not stated, but according to the news, London now has a women's volunteer police force wearing a distinctive new uniform, whose duties are principally to look after the welfare of the women and children. It is particularly apparent from the photograph of the new force that the uniform is said to have been including gloves was designed for service.

HATS OFF AND EVERY MAN STANDING. A committee of men of large imagination and exuberant patriotism is planning to have the whole United States ring the "Star-Spangled Banner" simultaneously at the moment that President Wilson, if he consents, touches a button to unfurl at the official opening of the Panama Canal an American flag which is to be made in the Betsy Ross house in Philadelphia, and the stars for which are to be supplied by the governors of the forty-eight states.

AN EXHIBIT THAT FAILED TO CONVINCE CONGRESS. Russia, in recently decreasing the national suppression of the liquor traffic, has given a tremendous object-lesson to the civilized world. With a single stroke of the czar's pen, it accrued $500,000,000 of its annual revenue. But what a transformation was effected in the nation! George Korman describes in the Outlook how the suppression of the liquor traffic was followed by a phenomenal decrease in crime throughout the empire. Jails formerly filled with drunken criminals are now nearly empty. Many cities report from 50 to 90 per cent. decrease in offenses of all kinds; murders, robberies, assaults, etc. He cites reports from over a score of populous centers as proof of the change, showing that in many places not only crime came almost disappeared, but the people themselves have become industrious, thrifty and contented. Before the royal edict was passed, Russia had a brief experience of several weeks in practical prohibition. Then, when it was proposed to re-establish the liquor traffic, the whole nation united in an appeal for its permanent extinction. The good results had become so apparent that all classes desired the continuance of prohibition. Five months have passed, and Russia has apparently settled down contentedly to the new order of things.

FLOODS IN ARIZONA AND MESOPOTAMIA. Both these sections of the globe have been experiencing destructive floods, live stock being lost and traffic seriously upset in Arizona by terrific rains and the swelling of streams, and in the city of Bagdad twelve thousand persons are reported by Ambassador Morgenthau at Constantinople as having been made homeless by the overflow of the Tigris, a tributary of the Tigris.

DIGGING THEIR OWN GRAVES. The Boston Transcript prints a letter received by the parents of a French soldier in which he describes the digging of trenches by the infantry, as follows: "The artillery prepares the way in the afternoon. As soon as night falls we move to the front line, and when the enemy's fire quiets we take a rifle in one hand, a shovel or pick in the other, and move over the flat land, crawling along on our stomachs. At the command 'Halt!' without rising and with our knapsacks as a protection against the whistling bullets we dig desperately. It is remarkable how quickly a hole may be dug when the bullets are kicking up the loose earth above your heads. When the soldiers have dug their individual trenches they must be connected, but this work may be done more leisurely. Next, the entire trench is deepened so that by morning we can stand up straight and aim comfortably over the crest at the line opposite. We must also burrow little caves to sleep in and tunnels communicating with the rear."

THE DEATH OF ALFRED H. LEWIS. An American author who had a wide audience, Alfred Henry Lewis, died at his home in New York, December 23, at the age of fifty-seven. Mr. Lewis was born in Cleveland, Ohio, and became a lawyer and then an editor and writer. He won popular attention by his stories of the Far West, and later by a story in book form which purported to expose the inner workings of a notorious political organization.

BABIES NO LONGER AN EXCUSE TO STAY HOME FROM CHURCH. The J. Addison Henry Memorial Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia has instituted, with every promise of its being a popular success, a nursery in which mothers may leave their infants in the care of volunteer nurses during the church services, cots, toys, swings and other devices often employed in the subordination of the young being at hand, to say nothing of bottles and a place for warming milk.

A PEACE CELEBRATION WITH PEACE LEFT OUT. It can scarcely be said that the ambitious plans inaugurated three or four years ago in the formation of a huge committee of one of the most prominent men for the celebration of the completion of one hundred years of peace between English-speaking peoples, have materialized. The great day of December 21, the one hundredth anniversary of the signing of the treaty of Ghent, finds England at war and the ancient town of Ghent, where a notable banquet was to take place, at the center of hostilities. The exercises of December 21 have been largely abandoned, and other features of the year-long celebration have suffered by the war in Europe. The American Peace Centenary Committee, however, still calls upon the nation to consider the advantages of peace at this time, and special exercises in churches are urged for February 14, and wherever else possible, especially in schools, February 17, 18 and 22.

NO CENSUS OF AGRICULTURE. The proposal to take a census of agriculture in 1915 at a cost of about two and a quarter million dollars, has been quashed by the House, sitting as a committee of the whole to consider the legislative, executive and judiciary appropriation bill.

BUDDHIST TREASURES DESTROYED BY FIRE. The wooden building in the Kurinor native city of the Mongols which was the temple palace of the spiritual and temporal sovereign of Mongolia, Kuruktu, the living Buddha, known as the Deified Lama, is reported as having been destroyed by fire with loss of treasures of fabulous value which had accumulated as offerings from devotees through many centuries, consisting chiefly of priceless gold and silver vessels inlaid with precious stones, and including a brass Buddha image said to be over one hundred feet high and profusely ornamented with precious stones, the thank-offering of the present Buddha for restored eyesight.

THE CALL OF GIDEON

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR JANUARY 17. (JUDGES 6: 11-40)

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By Rev. F. B. Meyers, D.D.

"Blessed is the man whom thou choosest." Ps. 65: 4.

It is God's method to choose men and women that through them he may help and bless others. There are chosen stars, as one differeth from another in glory; but they shine with brighter light in the vault of night not for themselves, but to point the voyager across the main. If you use for yourself gifts and graces bestowed on you for the sake of others, yours will be the condemnation of the unfaithful servant. There is a deep blessedness in knowing that Christ is using you in his holy service. But this blessedness is co-existent with a great amount of outward friction, persecution and sorrow, which are needed to fit us more perfectly for our work. When our Lord told Ananias that Saul of Tarsus was a chosen vessel, he added: "I will shew him how many things he must suffer for my sake." But how deep a note of blessedness rings through the epistles of the great apostle! "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, for as the sufferings of Christ abound unto us, even so our comfort aboundeth through Christ."

Strength Out of Weakness

By Rev. Edward Whittier Caswell

REFORMATION does not begin with masses of men, but with single individuals. Years of faithfulness in little duties form the noble character which is suddenly displayed in some great crisis. The angel called Gideon "a mighty man of valor," because he knew the fiber and texture of his manhood. He who was found grinding out the grain in a secluded spot was to be the chosen leader in a great conflict. The angel knew Gideon better than he knew himself. Gideon felt that he was a coward, hiding in a hillside, while multitudes of the Midianites were devastating the valleys, but the Lord exclaimed, "Go in thy might and save Israel; have I not sent thee?"

Gideon, like Moses, begged to be excused, saying, "I am least in my father's house." But when the Lord said, "Surely I will be with thee," light and love filled the soul of the modest hero, as he cried out, "I have seen an angel of the Lord, face to face. He has spoken to me, saying, Peace be unto thee; fear not. Thou shalt not die." Gideon now felt that God and one man were a majority. He began first at his own door, striking down the altar of Baal, as the disciples began at Jerusalem and as Andrew began with his brother, Simon Peter.

After the added sign of the fleece the called leader went forth to victory in full assurance of faith. One writer says, "Gideon's mother made a mantle of that fleece, which Gideon wore under his armor, next to his heart, in all his battles." That was but an outward sign of an inward power. Gideon realized that it was not by might or by power, but by the Spirit of the Lord that he was to win. The battle was not with the strong, for not many mighty, not many noble, are called. God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise, the weak to confound the mighty, even the things which are not to bring to nought the things that are.

The history of the race is full of the service of lowly persons, who have been lifted to lofty achievements. Moses and David were taken from their flocks; Elisha from the plow, the disciples from their fishing nets. Bunyan was the tinker; Burritt, the blacksmith; Moody, the clerk; Grant, the tanner; Carey, the cobbler; Lincoln, the rail-splitter, and Billy Sunday the ball-player.

No service in itself is small,
None great, though earth it fill,
But that is small which seeks its own,
That great, which does God's will.

The angel came between God and man on the principle of mediation. God did not directly scourge Israel because of her backsliding, but permitted the Midianites to trouble her. Man is to save man under God's guidance. So Jesus came, the God-sent, divine man, and Mediator between God and man.

Alexander the Great conquered a world, but appetite conquered him. He was weakest where he should have been the strongest. He that ruleth his spirit is greater than he that taketh a city. Gideon's greatest victory was when he conquered himself. Jesus would not make stones into bread to satisfy his own hunger, but he would feed five thousand when it was for others. Gideon's consecration and heroism was for Israel and all coming ages. Standing in his shadow, multitudes have manifested like heroism. We must love the truth enough to be willing to die for it. Then, losing life is saving it. Legions of angels would have saved Jesus' life, but it was worth infinitely more to humanity and to Christ himself to give his life for men. Gideon had a great opportunity and he measured up to it grandly. He developed under Almighty guidance and power, a new self, full of trust, courage and moral grandeur, enriching and inspiring all generations following.

Eventful moments are hinges of destiny. What if Gideon had refused God's call, postponed decision, said to the angel, "Go thy way for this time"? He would have been merely a cave-dweller, unknown in history. He came to the fork in the road and obeyed the voice which said, "This is the way; walk ye in it." Gideon understood the pivotal value of the moment on which turned the immortal glory of a human soul.

Gideon

By Arthur H. Howland

THE story of Gideon is one of the most fascinating and inspiring of the whole Bible. It is full of phrases and incidents which have taken permanent place in the thought and speech of the Jewish and Christian world. Read the whole story, as you find it in the 6th, 7th and 8th chapters of Judges.

Notice some of these striking expressions and incidents.

"The Lord is with thee, thou mighty man of valor" (6: 12). Those were great words to be addressed to a young farmer.

"Go in this thy might" (6: 14).

"I will be with thee" (6: 16). With the same words Jesus left his disciples, after he had told them to wait for the power which he would send upon them for this task of evangelizing the world: "Lo, I am with you alway."

Gideon made a good beginning by breaking down the heathen altar on his own father's estate. He had ten men with him for that exploit. He had a great work to do in the future; he began with a small task in the present. It took courage. To deliver Israel from their enemies he would want the co-operation of his fellow countrymen. Yet he began by alienating them. He insisted at the beginning on making his work right; he would have no compromises, even in his own household.

His father stood by him splendidly. "It is up to Baal," he said. "If he cannot defend himself we need not worry about offending him."

Then Gideon "blew a trumpet." That meant action, conflict, loyalty, a challenge. Who is on the Lord's side? And he rallied his army from every side. The outcome we shall study in our next lesson.

Echoes from the Holy Land

By Rev. Franklin E. Hoskins, D.D.
Member of Syria Mission

THE character of Gideon is among the most striking and inspiring of the Old Testament. Brave, tactful, shrewd, forceful, full of expedients, his life gives us more inspiring examples and watchwords than perhaps any other single individual. "The sword of the Lord and of Gideon" reminds us of many other stirring characters in history. "Lamps, pitchers and trumpets recall many other similar events of daring. "Ophrah" is a town on the west side of the Jordan within easy reach of the plain of Jezreel and apparently in one of the sloping valleys leading to that famous battlefield. "Beating out wheat in a winepress"—no more difficult process could be imagined as a substitute for threshing with oxen on a spacious threshing floor. Fear and dire necessity for secrecy speak eloquently of the sad plight of Israel about twenty-five years before God saved them by the hand of Deborah and Barak.

The Midianites trace their origin to Abraham. Moses married a Midianite woman. They appear in Genesis as traders moving about in companies on camels. They are so closely connected with the Ishmaelites that at certain periods it is impossible to separate them. Together with the Amalekites they are a part of that great roving portion of the Semitic race which we know as Bedawin, who have lived from time immemorial about the borders of Palestine and whose history is as uncertain and as unstable as the waves of the sea or the sands of the desert, always shifting back and forward as the ruling powers wax and wane in their sway over them. Dean Stanley in a picturesque paragraph, has said: "Palestine is an island in the midst of pirates. The wandering tribes are the corsairs of the wilderness, the plains which run into the mountains are the creeks into which they naturally penetrate."

We who dwell in Palestine today and journey east and west of the Jordan and across the plain of Esdraelon listen to the stories from the Circassians, the Bedawin, the Druzes, the Christians and the Turks, which match and illustrate the events of the book of Judges in every detail, with this important addition: that into this confusion of blood and tongues have come other elements still further complicating the situation. The Germans have colonies at Haifa and through the plain of Esdraelon. The Jews have colonies on almost all its borders and speculative landowners are buying in every direction.

A Million Testaments

"Proceed"

THIS was the word that was cabled from the State Department in Washington on December 17, 1914, to the Rev. A. W. Clark, D.D., who is in Europe representing the interests of the American Bible Society in connection with his missionary work for the American Board. He was awaiting this word for authority to go ahead at once with the printing and distribution of a special edition of 20,000 copies of the Gospels in the Bohemian language for use in the Austrian army. This work had been originally planned by the National Bible Society of Scotland, but King George's proclamation, expressly forbidding the sending of funds, directly or indirectly, into the enemy's country, made it impossible to carry out the plan. The American Bible Society was appealed to and they in turn referred the appeal to the Sunday school scholars of America, with the result that Dr. Clark has been notified by cablegram that American Sunday schools will not permit the work to fail for lack of support. Dr. Clark will have printed inside the cover of each book, "Presented by an American Sunday school scholar."

This is simply one field. There will be no partiality to any particular countries. All the warring nations will be remembered: they all need the Book.

Sunday school scholars of America are responding with enthusiasm. Despite all the distractions of the holiday season in Sunday school work man thousands of nickels were collected by that shown in the accompanying picture, were sent out to the givers of the nickels. The cradle roll is representative too—as it should be. One mother sent in a contribution for her little one who is not yet old enough to go to Sunday school, but whom she wishes to have represented in the movement. Perhaps that baby boy, grown to be white-haired old man, will say some day, "This slip of paper represents what I did to help the soldiers in that last great war of history."

If you desire to help in this great Christian service write for enough

THE WAY OUT

BY ELIZABETH BURGESS HUGHES

"HALLE, February 10.

DEAR FRIEND: Tomorrow I start home—after four years of student life. And glad enough I'll be to see that unmatchable figure looking out across the waste of waters, our Liberty, welcoming me home. I'm ready for life, Charley. I feel wine in my veins, the beat of it in my pulses. The preparation has been long, but I believe it was justified. I make you folks sit up, see if I don't! Not especially elegant diction from the American who hopes before middle life to occupy the presidency, eh? Well, school's at today, Charley, and I'm off—not for a holiday, but for life and work. The world is mine for the taking. Oh, it's great to be young and strong and ambitious! I intend to accomplish wonderful things. There's really no limit to what I mean to do. This isn't egotism—it's sincerity.

"Awfully glad you are to be in New York when the George Washington docks. Of course you'll meet me and help fight off any kodak fiends who may be lying in wait for (to be) notable Americans!

"Jubilantly yours,
"JOHN FLEMING."

from the Darien City News:

"Among those on board the George Washington, which is due at New York Tuesday, is Mr. John Fleming of this city, who is returning home after four years of study abroad. Our brilliant townsman, for whom great things are predicted, will reach Darien City the latter part of the week, and will, no doubt, be kept busy for a time greeting welcoming and admiring friends."

from the Darien City News:

"Our little city is plunged into mourning. The terrible wreck on the N. and W. railway, which bereaved so many, was taken from us three of our noblest citizens and injured others. Among those desperately wounded is Mr. John Fleming, who was en route home from New York, after four years abroad. He is still alive, but reports from his bedside are not encouraging. . . ."

"DARIEN CITY, August 2.

"My friend, oh, my friend, how am I to bear it? A helpless, hopeless chunk of flesh, lying here, begging God to let me die! At first—well, I didn't feel things very clearly, except that old line of pagan Omar's that went on and fro through my head: 'The bird of time has but a little way to flutter—and the bird is on the wing.' Nobody else expected anything but death—why should I? . . . Oh, if only it had come! It seemed a simple enough solution, then. Now that the soul of me is still lingering here in this broken shell, the thing's grown complex. Dying—dead—yet alive! Can anything be more horrible?"

"Thank you for your letter. And you needn't mind calling to my notice in that roundabout and highly poetical fashion that I've got to go on living—that I dare not end it all, as I'd thought of doing. I may not take your warning seriously; our lives—whether whole or mere broken pieces—are our own to do with as we will, aren't they? And I don't mind telling you there's a vial of chloral on the table at the head of my bed. All human suffering must be punctuated sometime, somehow, friend o' mine. God would understand—I think."

"August 15.

"I want to thank you for the book—and the violets. I've a notion you fill the place in my life that a woman fills in the average man's. That's because of what I call the 'violet sense'—a sort of sixth sense—in you. If you didn't have the rare comprehension that belongs to a great and sensitive soul I'd have turned from you, too. Or rather you'd have turned from me. Many have. I was a nine days' sensation at first, and the place was like a conservatory, with flowers and jellies and tracts arriving hourly. The telephone jangled constantly, and there were plenty of sympathetic notes and notices. But it's an old story now, you see. I've settled down to a hopeless life-long invalidism—and ugly invalidism, for I'm terribly disfigured. My right arm's gone, Charley—that strong right arm, which I'd pictured defending a nation! And I've no voice to speak of—my throat was burned in the fire following the smash-up. There's nothing left—God is cruel—why didn't he let me die?"

"But, anyway, there's the chloral. . . . Nothing to prevent my accomplishing that deed of mercy he left undone, is there?"

"September 1.

"Well, well—why didn't you go into the ministry earlier in life? You might have been famous as Spurgeon by now. That last sermon you gave me would clinch the matter, if the public could hear it. Your friendship I prize above everything. But your logic—no! I can't see it your way; and I prefer that you wouldn't quote any more Scripture, please. I'm in hell's darkness—let me alone. Let me alone!"

"September 3.

"I didn't mean it, friend—I'd be in blinder darkness without you. Forgive me. As a proof of my humility, I'm even willing to have you pray for me—"

"October 1.

"Do you know what I did today? Took a starved cat in out of the rain and fed and warmed it. I thought of what a convict told me once of a hideous spider that crawled about the walls of his cell. It was alive, and he was starving for life; so he watched and loved it, and wept when he found it dead. One sick mentally walks very near the borderland of mania, doesn't he? I felt as if I loved that wet, hungry bit of life because I had saved it. And yet—for what? More wandering about the lonely streets, beaten, starved, deserted—"

"November 3.

"I've been reading them all—Huxley, Spencer, Kant. Even the Imitation of Christ, if you will. And they are dust and ashes. I want back my strong young body, the hopes and ambitions that made me a mortal god, the future with its white banners of accomplishment. Oh, Charley, I want no religious cant—no conventional comfortings. I am sick of shadows. I want—what I have lost. Poor Job! His wife displayed a remarkably human point of view when she gave him that bit of advice, didn't she? 'Curse God and die!' . . . No, I don't want to do that. I've stopped caring about death. Ten to one it wouldn't solve the problem. You see, I do believe in a continuation of this life!"

. . . "The sunshine hurts; these soundless dead days are in accord with my mood. The world and my soul are gray."

"January 12.

"Yesterday someone wrote me—a stranger. He was meant from the beginning for a public man, he said, and had just completed his education when an illness deprived him of his voice. Would I, deprived, too, tell him how to pick up the threads of life where they were dropped? I! I laughed aloud at that. . . . But I wrote to him."

"January 19.

"You ask what I wrote. Well, to tell the truth, a little of the orthodox anodyne you've been giving me. The odd part of it was, at the time I really meant it."

"March 1.

"He has written again—and again. Also others. The pigeon-holes of my desk are beginning to fill with such letters. I don't know how it has happened. At first I wasn't interested. Mechanically speaking, I couldn't write, you know. But I learned to plink out letters with my left hand on an old typewriter. It helped, of course, for it kept me from brooding. And so I've gotten in touch with a dozen souls crying out, as I cried: Help me to bear it!"

"This is spiritual homeopathy, Charles. Sometimes the very weakness of the others made me strong; their determination to go down under their burdens helped me to get out from under mine. There are two, especially, who tell me that they need me—that I must keep on writing. The others fume and fret when I exhaust myself trying to make clear to them just what they demand—but they write again."

"Those first two—well, I can't quite make them out. Both are extraordinarily morbid. One is a woman who went blind just as a cherished dream of authorship began to crystallize. She said she was sitting in darkness—God had forsaken her—all the usual mad cant. I wasn't able to offer any but practical advice. I told her to get a typewriter and learn the touch system. She followed up the suggestion; and now she's on her knees to me, figuratively. She is happy in her work, and the weird, self-destructing strain of bitterness is disappearing under its healthy influence. The miracle was, she hadn't thought of that simple way out, nor had any one else suggested it to her. They would have, of course, in time. Some of her work is wonderful; she seems to have an uncanny vision of the human heart now that physical sight is gone."

"The other is a man who was sent to prison twelve years ago. He was to have been a missionary. Can you equal the irony of that? He is one of the finest souls I know. Heretical-sounding, maybe, to you, but it's true. His crime—well, there were extenuating circumstances. He has repented in sackcloth and ashes and his concern now is for the future. He wants to take up his old plans and become the foreign missionary he meant to be. Well—I told him to go to work where he is, among his kind—not his kind, exactly, but those who have worn the stripes. Pain-ordained, he should be able to make men of them. He will be out in a couple of weeks, and I'm watching to see what he means to do with himself."

"The others—just the same all through: Pain, deprivation, rebellion. I give each a word out of my year of perdition—that's all I can do. I never write a depressing or discouraging line. I'd pitch this old typewriter out of the window before I'd do that. Broken shell of a man that I am, there's no dodging a certain responsibility; and I'd no more hurt a soul with the cynicism and bitterness of my suffering than I'd smirch the white lily you sent yesterday. Still, I don't write foolish and insincere encouragement, either; usually it's just: 'I'm sorry. Will you let me try to help you?'—feeling, nay, knowing, all the time that it's the

PURITY

The spotless, creamy appearance of Crisco in its freshly opened can is only the outward sign of the purity of its make-up.

It is entirely vegetable, containing no animal fat to become rancid or to overtax the digestion. It is made from pure materials under conditions as nearly ideal as human brains can contrive. It is untouched by hand in the processes of manufacture.

CRISCO
For Frying—For Shortening
For Cake Making

Crisco represents perfect purity—and because of that purity has won a deserved place in the better homes throughout the nation.

Use Crisco in all cooking where shortening or frying is to be done.

Beautiful cloth-bound book of new recipes and a "Calendar of Dinners" for five 2-cent stamps!

This handsome book by Marion Harris Neil gives 615 excellent tested recipes. Also contains a "Calendar of Dinners"—a dinner menu for every day in the year. The Calendar tells what; the recipes tell how. Book also contains cookery hints and the interesting story of Crisco's development. Bound in blue and gold cloth. To those answering this advertisement, it will be sent for five 2-cent stamps. Address Department S-1, The Procter & Gamble Co., Cincinnati, Ohio.

old parallel of the blind leading the blind. I have passed on the books you sent, after careful re-reading. I found more in them than I thought possible at first."

"June 30.

"I think I am beginning to understand."

"August 12.

"Service—that seems to constitute the whole scheme of life. It underlies Christ's existence here on earth like a brooding and beautiful musical motif. So long as one soul needs you, you are indispensable to God—so I'm gradually coming to believe. When we can no longer serve, we are junk—not before. And we can all serve in one way or another. Even I, who meant to wrest fame, wealth and happiness from life and make of it a flaring torchlight of triumph—well, I've come to see a good many things differently of late. If I had done all that, I should never have learned the real meaning of that word: Service. All my thought would have been for myself—what men were thinking of me. You know me well enough to be sure of that. I was just a bundle of raw egotism; hadn't even the tact to conceal it, had I?"

"Ah, this unending year! I've gone down into the depths of hell, friend—down into that lower region of ice Dante tells us about, and, in rare moments, up to illimitable heights. I have been growing, friend. I can feel myself sprout. I am finding myself. What a miracle that is . . . to grow! I am learning the heights and depths of life. Yesterday a good man referred to me as a 'refuge for sick souls.' I—I! What has happened, Charley-boy? Did my body get out of the way to make room for my soul?"

"September 30.

"Old fellow, you always understand! Your chrysanthemums are on my desk, heavy-headed, odorless, a jumble of rare colors; the windows are open and the slow Indian summer sunlight glances in. I can bear its steady gold now. That soundless dead November seems a long way off. Have you read the wonderful, just-published novel Out of the Dark by Beatrix Lenoir? That's my blind friend. And the book is dedicated to me: 'Him who brought me out of bondage!' Poetical license, of course; but I am still with the wonder of it. The critics agree with me that its author is to be reckoned with in the world of letters. There's a marvelous touch of subtle human sympathy in all she writes.

"No need to mention Delmar—he's playing missionary more effectively, perhaps, than he could have played it before his prison experience. Not without your help though; the world is bitterly cruel to the discharged convict. It was fine of you to stand by him in that friend-and-brother sort of way, without a shadow of patronage.

"My pigeon-holes are full; I cleared them today to make room for others. What a brotherhood of pain these letters represent! 'As fellow-sufferers we are one; and the bond that binds the world most closely is the bond of pain.'

"The fret and the fever are gone. Today I am conscious only of a wide peace. Can you wonder that I preach the doctrine of service to others? Through it I have groped toward God—slowly—slowly. And yet it is simple enough: just a cry of 'Godspeed!' to the ships passing in the night.

"In one meager detail, if no more, I've reached your plane of understanding, Charley—for which I thank God. Do you remember the verse you quoted to me once and which I flung aside as conventional nonsense? Well, I understand now; and I know with you that it is enough " . . . just to be good.

To lift our hearts where they are understood;
To let the thirst for worldly power and place
Go unappeased; to smile back in God's face
With the glad lips our mothers used to kiss.
Aye, though we miss all else but this,
To be good is enough!"

$100 a month net income from 20 acres in San Joaquin Valley California

A railroad brakeman, getting along in years, with no prospect of advancement, and guarding against the "blue-envelope" day that might dismiss him, bought a 20-acre farm in the fertile San Joaquin Valley, California, at $300 per acre (part on time payments). Nine acres each were planted to peaches and raisin grapes. From his 1914 crop he has a net profit above all expenses of $1,200, 20 per cent on his investment and a living besides. This first year he was new to conditions; next year he expects to do much better. Don't you want to do as well? Our San Joaquin Valley folder, free, tells of the experiences of many others, describes living conditions, crop possibilities, and in general answers the questions a man seeking to better his prospects wants to know about. It's worth money to you. Write for it to-day and tell me the line of farming you prefer, so that I can give you special information.

STICK TO IT

Until Coffee Hits You Hard.

It is about as well to advise people to stick to coffee until they get hit hard enough so that they will never forget their experience.

A woman writes and her letter is condensed to give the facts in a short space: "I was a coffee slave and stuck to it like glue to his 'cups,' notwithstanding I recently had severe attacks of sick headache; then I used more coffee to relieve the headache, and this was well enough until the coffee effect wore off.

"Finally attacks of rheumatism began to appear, and ultimately the whole muscular system began to break down and I was fast becoming a wreck.

"After a time I was induced to quit coffee and take up Postum. This was half a year ago. The result has been most satisfactory.

"The rheumatism is gone entirely, I am practically well and steady, digestion almost perfect, never have any sick headaches and am gaining weight and strength."

"I am given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read 'The Road to Well-Being' in pkgs.

Postum comes in two forms:

Regular Postum—must be well boiled, and 25c packages.

Instant Postum—is a soluble powder. It spoonful dissolves quickly in a cup of water and, with cream and sugar, is a delicious beverage instantly. and 50c tins.

The cost per cup of both kinds is about the same.

Paint Without Oil

Remarkable Discovery That Cuts Down the Cost of Paint Seventy-Five Per Cent.

Free Trial Package is Mailed to Everyone Who Writes

L. Rice, a prominent manufacturer of paint, N. Y., has discovered a process of making a new kind of paint without the use of oil. He calls it Powderpaint. It comes in the form of a dry powder and all that is required is water to make a paint weather proof, fire proof and as durable as oil paint. It adheres to surface, wood, stone or brick, spreads and like oil paint and costs about one-fourth as much.

Write to Mr. A. L. Rice, Manager, 85 North Adams, N. Y., and he will send you a free trial package, also color card and full information showing you how you can save a good many dollars. Write today.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETINGS

NOTES ON THE CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR, EPWORTH LEAGUE AND BAPTIST YOUNG PEOPLE'S UNION TOPICS

Make Bold Beginnings

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topics for January 17. 1 Tim. 1: 18, 19; 4: 12. (A young members' meeting, led by a beginner)

A NEW TESTAMENT study of the words, "bold, boldly, boldness," would disclose some interesting facts. We find Paul, who certainly was terrifically bold in the face of all sorts of opposition and danger and pain, asking his friends to pray that he might be bold. We hear the writer of the letter to the Hebrews exhorting his readers to "come boldly to the throne of grace." We hear the believers gathered at a prayer meeting after Pentecost, praying that "with all boldness" they might speak the word. Most interesting of all, we read, after Peter and John had, by the power of Jesus, healed the lame man, that the rulers, elders, scribes and Annas, Caiaphas, John, Alexander and "as many as were of the kindred of the high priest" noticed the boldness of these two apostles. That was pretty good for Peter, was it not? Peter—who had been cowed into blasphemy and abject disloyalty before the questionings of a maid servant on the night that Jesus was tried.

Why was it that Peter, who had been so base a coward on that night, had become in these few weeks so amazingly bold? The answer is found in what happened at Pentecost. A certain kind of fire fell then that changed Peter's heart from cowardice to courage.

It is like this. We read thrilling accounts now and then of mothers or brothers or sisters becoming baptized with amazing boldness. We read of a mother bursting into a blazing room to rescue her baby, or a boy dashing in front of a trolley car or under a horse's hoof to rescue his sister. What makes these women and children so bold? It is because there is a fire in their hearts hotter than the flames, stronger than the electric current that drives the car or the power that impels the galloping horses—the power of love.

Now, can we love Jesus like that? Love him so that we would fly to his defense as we would fly to rescue our brother or sister from flames or wheels or hoofs? That is the way to be bold. To let Jesus come so close to us, to let him change and cleanse us so fully, to let him fill us with his Holy Spirit so completely that we shall be bold, bold, bold. Bold to speak for him when opportunity offers; bold to defend his name when it is attacked or ridiculed; bold to stand for his principles and commands when others are forgetting or fighting them; bold to try to bring others to him.

Make that kind of a beginning for the year. Make that kind of a beginning in your work as a Christian Endeavorer or a Union comrade. In your play, in your reading, in your work, in your plans for the future, you scorn a coward. Don't be a cowardly Christian.

Admire Christ so much, love him so much, live so close to him, believe in his words and ways so enthusiastically, hate what he hates so vigorously that Annas and Caiaphas and Alexander and the kindred of the high priest and all the rest looking at you note your boldness, and "take knowledge that you have been with Jesus."

Notice how that verse ends. It is the 13th verse of the 4th chapter of Acts. It was not a self-confident boldness; it was not a boastful boldness; it was not a boldness that made others think, "These are great men." It was a boldness which made people say, "These men have been with Jesus." The way to be bold is to forget yourself and think of Jesus. Be bold, not for your own sake, nor on your own account, but for the sake of others, in the name of Christ.

Just now America needs, more than she needs anything else, men and women, boys and girls, with this same sort of Pentecostal boldness to stand against all the things that God hates and to win the hearts of the people to himself.

In many countries and in many ages boys and girls have met death willingly because they confessed the name of Jesus. That test will not come to us. But lesser tests will come, and it will need warm love and strong faith to keep us true. Make a bold beginning. Then work and fight boldly for our great Friend Jesus while life lasts.

A noble army, men and boys,
The nation and the maid,
Around the throne of God they stand
In spotless robes arrayed,
They climbed the steep ascent of heaven
Through peril, toil and pain;
O God, to us may grace be given
To follow in their train.

League Study Classes

Epworth League Topic for January 17. Deut. 11: 18-21; Prov. 15: 28; 1 Peter 3: 15b.

THERE is one thing absolutely indispensable to a successful League study class. It must be interesting. Begin the work by presenting a number of subjects and let the people who are interested in one special subject choose that book and get together for studying it. And surely among the books suggested for the half-year study term between now and summer-time are some that will compel interest at once. Then the teacher must help the book hold the class's interest till the course is done.

The Social Aspects of Foreign Missions, by W. H. P. Faunce. Do you realize how interesting that is—a study of the ways in which Christianity is changing the social customs and feelings in heathen lands? For home missions, H. Paul Douglas's book, The New Home Missions, containing pictures of life among the immigrants, life in the frontier, life in city slums and life in neglected country districts. Or, listen to this: The American Indian on the New Trail, by Thomas C. Moffett.

Harry F. Wood's book, The Social Creed of the Churches, tells how the church is waking up to bring justice and cheer and help to the workingman and the poor. McCain and Pickett's book, The Greatest Common Destroyer, pictures the gigantic waves of the new temperance reform and shows us how we may help.

For Bible study courses, The Church of the First Apostles, by C. H. Morgan, is recommended. Mr. Morgan has written another new book, Studies in Poets and Prophets of the Old Testament, completing the course beginning with Studies in the Old Testament and Studies in the Life of the Church, written by Mr. Morgan and Mr. Taylor, and continued in Mr. Morgan's Studies in the Early Church.

It is recommended that those who have not yet taken the course, The Earliest Portrait of Jesus, do so before starting any other. This course is conducted without text books, the Gospel of Mark being made the basis of study. Questions are asked, the answers to which the student finds in Mark and puts down in his note book. At the close of the course the student has in his hands the life of Christ which he himself has put together and which will make the narrative of Jesus forever more vivid and real to him.

All these books may be secured by writing to the Christian Herald.

SAFEGUARDING HUMAN LIFE

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

MY TICKET was for the second International Safety and Sanitation Exposition, and it was to be held at the New Grand Central Palace. I mused darkly on the uninterestingness of it as I swept uptown on a damp, unpleasant car, and wondered what earthly interest I could find in such a place.

The floor I got out at was a huge balcony surrounding an equally huge hall. All along the walls and down improvised aisles I saw booths containing anything from a stick of candy to an organ. On one of these booths there was a queer little bright object standing in the place of honor—an object with three legs and a sort of burner on top. I would have imagined it to be some kind of a tiny stove, but it had neither wick, electric batteries, gas attachment nor a place for fuel.

The man behind the counter saw me and came to the front of the booth. "A new invention," he explained to me; "the wickless kerosene stove!"

"How can a kerosene stove be wickless?" I questioned.

"Why," the man smiled proudly, "I'll show you how it works. It's going to be very popular when it becomes known, for it is absolutely safe."

There was a tiny cup of alcohol in the middle of the stove. The man lighted it and then with a swift movement of the hand he began to pump a tiny lever back and forth. I gasped in surprise as a clear blue flame jumped over the entire burner and began to grow steady. The man laughed at my surprise.

There was a stairway at the side of the balcony leading to the main room below and I walked slowly down and out into one of the largest halls I have ever seen. In the very center a huge elevator ran up some twenty-five or fifty feet and stopped short. I saw it go up and down several times as I stood there.

"It's a demonstration," I heard one man say to another, "of an elevator. It was put up completely in a few hours, and it is absolutely safe. A lot of department store men should be interested in it."

I thought of some terrible elevator accidents that I had read of and wished that all department store men would get interested in it.

Behind me I heard a tiny clang of machinery, the faint puff, puff of a steam engine. I turned sharply and saw a small, perfectly laid-out railroad track with an engine some four feet long running swiftly along it. Above it there was a sign, giving the name of a railroad called by some people "The Safe Railroad." The miniature railroad was intended to show how a real railroad can be made safe. The little engine was complete in every detail, from its shiny finishings to its sturdy little brakes. Even the gravel on the small track came from the bed of the large railroad.

It would take too long to tell you in detail all the wonderful things I saw. There were booths with pure grape juice and there were sanitary washing machines. Turning one corner I came suddenly on a huge iron figure that made me start back in fright, until I saw that it was only a diver's uniform. I tried to imagine being under the waves in the heavy, clumsy thing, and shuddered at the thought of it. Still the sign hanging above proclaimed it to be absolutely safe, and told of a marvelous dive that had been made in it. I saw safety brakes on automobiles, and safety guards on cars. I saw flashlight cameras and stove-lighters that could not set fire to anything—that flamed from friction alone. I saw adjustable dress forms, and trade magazines, and improved ice cream freezers, and electric batteries. I saw safety matches and strong cables for trolley cars.

"Why shouldn't science," said I, "which has already done so many wonderful things, succeed in making our elevators safe, and if elevators, why not trolley cars and railway trains? A life-saving fender would probably have saved that traffic policeman who was crushed to death by the trolley right in front of our office windows the other day. Poor fellow! Then how many fires come from unsafe kerosene lamps and what a toll of human life is paid every year through the lack of just such safeguards as I have been looking at. But the biggest rewards for science, it seems, are not given for saving, but for destroying."

This was the thought in my mind as I left the exhibition. At the door stood a little woman with a knobby umbrella in one hand and a worn suitcase in the other. She was evidently from the country.

"Land!" she murmured to me, "ain't it wonderful? Here we are having safety expositions in New York, an' across the ocean they're killin' and inventin' new ways to kill—and nobody's safe!"

"It is wonderful," I agreed warmly. The whole significance flashed through my mind and I smiled. "It is wonderful!" I said. And after all I am very glad I saw this exhibition of what the lusty Safety First movement really means. It means for one thing that a great many minds in all walks of life are concentrated on the humane (and economic) problem of reducing accidents to human beings. I wish the movement a happy New Year.

THE WAR IN EUROPE

DESTRUCTION OF FORTIFICATIONS WROUGHT BY SIEGE GUNS

at Prussia and the River Vistula, the Russians have succeeded in beating back the German defensive.

In Central Poland the Germans continue to advance without serious interruption, but nevertheless with an enormous toll of lives on one side and the other. It is here that the genius of the man, a great commander, who possesses in himself the two qualities of a commander and strategist, General Hindenburg, the only find of the war so far, is most exhibited. Here then the Germans are advancing at a comparatively steady rate, have seized in their advance the railways and roads by which Russia must send forward troops, be it from one side or be it from the other. But even though this advance in the spectacular goal, Warsaw, the real goal is not won. The course of the Vistula is the real goal. Once possession of the eastward bank of the river and the fortresses along this bank, Germany can halt, because this controls the whole railway situation of Russia, who, though she may have to use, in the language of an American newspaper phrase, billions of men, cannot then get them forward to where they are needed.

The Polish situation would seem to be, at the present moment, the crux of the war, and if it inclines to the side of Germany she will have no more fear of the Russian bear and she will be able to devote her energies to the side wherein it is most necessary, and this side is necessarily where she will meet the English.

The French are fighting gallantly and dying nobly, but after all, the French have not the power of resistance which characterizes the English. The power of resistance is going to win the war and in this the Canadian and the Australian will be factors. If Germany is defeated it will be England who does it. France, Belgium, Serbia, etc., will not do it, although they lay down their lives for the doing of it. When will England wake up to the great danger which confronts her?

BATTLESHIP BULWARK SUNK IN ESTUARY OF THE THAMES BY UNEXPLAINED EXPLOSION, LATE IN NOVEMBER

WAS much interested to hear of Pollyanna's friends in far-away America. Sometimes I wonder where that little girl and her glad game will be. Have I told you that Pollyanna has been translated into the Swedish language, and that she is in New York for the blind? Many of my letters are very pathetic. They come from the blind, the sick, the crippled and the unhappy. Others are most interesting. One has just come from a Charles Ames, who wants to know more about the "Dr. Charlie Ames" in the Pollyanna story.—ELEANOR H. BARTER, Author of Pollyanna.

AMONG the contributions to worthy benevolences sent to the Christian Herald are some from readers who desire to remain anonymous. One of these unknown donors in New York City sends $50 with the request that it be applied "to the widows and orphans of the household of faith." The gift has been divided equally between the European war widows and orphans and the orphans in care of our Protestant missions in China. A friend in Ohio who does not wish her name to be printed sends $5 "for the Belgian sufferers," which will be applied as she requests.

different from her dead sister's son. So Pollyanna knew that she could not tell Mrs. Carew why she wanted her to go to walk tomorrow in the Public Garden. But there would be a way, declared Pollyanna to herself as she happily hurried homeward.

Fate, however, as it happened, once more intervened in the shape of a heavy rainstorm, and Pollyanna did not have to more than look out of doors the next morning to realize that there would be no Public Garden stroll that day. Worse yet, neither the next day nor the next saw the clouds dispelled, and Pollyanna spent all three afternoons wandering from window to window, peering up into the sky and anxiously demanding of every one: "Don't you think it looks a little like clearing up?"

So unusual was this behavior on the part of the cheery little girl, and so irritating was the constant questioning, that at last Mrs. Carew lost her patience.

"For pity's sake, child, what is the trouble?" she cried. "I never knew you to fret so about the weather. Where's that wonderful glad game of yours today?"

Pollyanna reddened and looked abashed.

"Dear me! I reckon maybe I did forget the game this time," she admitted. "And of course there is something about it I can be glad for, if I'll only hunt for it. I can be glad that—that it will have to stop raining sometime, 'cause God said he wouldn't send another flood. But, you see, I did so want it to be pleasant today."

"Why, especially?"

"Oh, I—I just wanted to go to walk in the Public Garden." Pollyanna was trying hard to speak unconcernedly. "I—I thought maybe you'd like to go with me, too." Outwardly Pollyanna was nonchalance itself. Inwardly, however, she was aquiver with excitement and suspense.

"I go to walk in the Public Garden?" queried Mrs. Carew, with brows slightly uplifted. "Thank you, no, I'm afraid not," she smiled.

"Oh, but you—you wouldn't refuse!" faltered Pollyanna, in quick panic.

"I have refused."

Pollyanna swallowed convulsively. She had grown really pale.

"But, Mrs. Carew, please, please, don't say you won't go, when it gets pleasant," she begged. "You see, for a special reason, I wanted you to go—with me—just this once."

Mrs. Carew frowned. She opened her lips to make the "no" more decisive; but something in Pollyanna's pleading eyes must have changed the words, for when they came they were a reluctant acquiescence.

"Well, well, child, have your own way. But if I promise to go, you must promise not to go near the window for an hour, and not to ask again today if I think it's going to clear up."

"Yes'm, I will—I mean, I won't," palpitated Pollyanna. Then as a pale shaft of light, that was almost a sunbeam, came aslant through the window she cried joyously: "But you do think it is going to—oh!" she broke off in dismay, and ran from the room.

Unmistakably it "cleared up" the next morning. But though the sun shone brightly there was a sharp chill in the air and by afternoon, when Pollyanna came home from school, there was a brisk wind. In spite of protests, however, she insisted that it was a beautiful day out, and that she should be perfectly miserable if Mrs. Carew would not come for a walk in the Public Garden. And Mrs. Carew went, though still protesting.

As might have been expected, it was a fruitless journey. Together the impatient woman and the anxious-eyed little girl hurried shiveringly up one path and down another. (Pollyanna, not finding the boy in his accustomed place, was making frantic search in every nook and corner of the Garden. To Pollyanna it seemed that she could not have it so. Here she was in the Garden, and here with her was Mrs. Carew; but not anywhere to be found was Jamie—and yet not one word could she say to Mrs. Carew.) At last, thoroughly chilled and exasperated, Mrs. Carew insisted on going home, and despairingly Pollyanna went.

Sorry days came to Pollyanna then. What to her was perilously near a second deluge—but according to Mrs. Carew was merely "the usual fall rains"—brought a series of damp, foggy, cold, cheerless days, filled with either a dreary drizzle of rain or, worse yet, a steady downpour. If perchance occasionally there came a day of sunshine Pollyanna always flew to the Garden, but in vain. Jamie was never there. It was the middle of November now, and even the Garden itself was full of dreariness. The trees were bare, the benches almost empty, and not one boat on the little pond. True, the squirrels and pigeons were there, and the sparrows were as pert as ever, but to feed them was almost more of a sorrow than a joy, for every saucy switch of Sir Lancelot's feathery tail but brought bitter memories of the lad who had given him his name—and who was not there.

"And to think I didn't find out where he lived!" mourned Pollyanna to herself, over and over again, as the days passed. "And he was Jamie—I just know he was Jamie. And now I'll have to wait and wait till spring comes, and it's warm enough for him to come here again. And then, maybe, I shan't be coming here by that time. Oh, dear, oh, dear—and he was Jamie, I know he was Jamie!"

Then, one dreary afternoon, the unexpected happened. Pollyanna, passing through the upper hallway, heard angry voices in the hall below, one of which she recognized as being Mary's, while the other—the other—

The other voice was saying: "Not on yer life! It's nix on the beggin' business. Do yer get me? I wants ter see the kid, Pollyanna. I got a message for her from Sir James. Now beat it, will ye, and trot out the kid, if ye don't mind."

With a glad little cry Pollyanna turned and fairly flew downstairs.

"Oh, I'm here, I'm here, I'm right here!" she panted, stumbling forward. "What is it? Did Jamie send you?"

In her excitement she had almost flung herself with outstretched arms upon the boy when Mary interposed a shocked, restraining hand.

"Miss Pollyanna, Miss Pollyanna, do you mean to say that you know this—this begger boy?"

The boy flushed angrily, but before he could speak Pollyanna interposed valiant championship.

"He isn't a beggar boy. He belongs to one of my very best friends. Besides, he's the one that found me and brought me home that time I was lost." Then to the boy she turned with impetuous questioning: "What is it? Did Jamie send you?"

"Sure he did. He hit the hay a month ago, and he hain't been up since."

"He hit—what?" puzzled Pollyanna.

"Hit the hay—went ter bed. He's sick, I mean, and he wants ter see ye. Will ye come?"

"Sick? Oh, I'm so sorry!" grieved Pollyanna. "Of course I'll come. I'll go get my hat and coat right away."

"Miss Pollyanna!" gasped Mary in stern disapproval. "As if Mrs. Carew would let you go—anywhere with a strange boy like this!"

"But he isn't a strange boy," objected Pollyanna. "I've known him ever so long, and I must go. I—"

"What in the world is the meaning of this?" demanded Mrs. Carew icily from the drawing-room doorway. "Pollyanna, who is this boy, and what is he doing here?"

Pollyanna turned with a quick cry. "Oh, Mrs. Carew, you'll let me go, won't you?"

"Go where?"

"To see my brother, ma'am," cut in the boy hurriedly, and with an obvious effort to be polite. "He's sort of off his feed, ye know, and he wouldn't give me no peace till I come up—after her," with an awkward gesture toward Pollyanna. "He thinks a sight an' all of her."

"I may go, mayn't I?" pleaded Pollyanna.

Mrs. Carew frowned.

"Go with this boy—you? Certainly not, Pollyanna! I wonder you are wild enough to think of it for a moment."

"Oh, but I want you to come, too," began Pollyanna.

"I? Absurd, child! That is impossible. You may give this boy here a little money, if you like, but—"

"Thank ye, ma'am, but I didn't come for money," resented the boy, his eyes flashing. "I come for—her."

"Yes, and Mrs. Carew, it's Jerry—Jerry Murphy, the boy that found me when I was lost, and brought me home," appealed Pollyanna. "Now won't you let me go?"

Mrs. Carew shook her head.

"It's out of the question, Pollyanna."

"But he says Ja—the other boy is sick, and wants me!"

"I can't help that."

"And I know him real well, Mrs. Carew. I do, truly. He reads books—lovely books, all full of knights and lords and ladies, and he feeds the birds and squirrels, and gives 'em names, and everything. And he can't walk, and he doesn't have enough to eat, lots of days," panted Pollyanna; "and he's been playing my glad game for a year and didn't know it. And he plays it ever and ever so much better than I do. And I've hunted and hunted for him, ever and ever so many days. Honest and truly, Mrs. Carew, I've just got to see him," almost sobbed

Pollyanna. "I can't lose him again!"

An angry color flamed into Mrs. Carew's cheeks.

"Pollyanna, this is sheer nonsense. I am surprised. I am amazed at you for insisting upon doing something you know I disapprove of. I can not allow you to go with this boy. Now please let me hear no more about it."

A new expression came to Pollyanna's face. With a look half terrified, half exalted, she lifted her chin and squarely faced Mrs. Carew. Tremulously, but determinedly, she spoke.

"Then I'll have to tell you. I didn't mean to—till I was sure. I wanted you to see him first. But now I've got to tell. I can't lose him again. I think, Mrs. Carew, he's—Jamie."

"Jamie! Not—my—Jamie!" Mrs. Carew's face had grown very white.

"Yes."

"Impossible!"

"I know; but, please, his name is Jamie, and he doesn't know the other one. His father died when he was six years old, and he can't remember his mother. He's twelve years old, he thinks. These folks took him in when his father died, and his father was queer, and didn't tell his name, and—"

But Mrs. Carew had stopped her with a gesture. Mrs. Carew was even whiter than before, but her eyes burned with a sudden fire.

"We'll go at once," she said. "Mary, tell Perkins to have the car here as soon as possible. Pollyanna, get your hat and coat. Boy, wait here, please. We'll be ready to go with you immediately. The next minute she had hurried upstairs."

In the hall the boy drew a long breath.

"Gee whiz!" he muttered softly. "If we ain't goin' ter go in a buzz-wagon! Some class ter that! What'll Sir James say?"

AMONG THE WORKERS

—EVANGELIST EDWIN S. STUCKER, of Ottawa, Kan., reports four good meetings in Kansas and Iowa since September. His next meeting ends about January 15 at McCook, Neb. Mr. Stucker is a well known Chautauqua lecturer, and secretary, in the town of his boyhood, of the second oldest Chautauqua in the world, but gives his winter months almost entirely to evangelistic work. He was associated with Dr. Chapman in his Chicago and Brooklyn campaigns and in Bible conference work at Winona Lake, Ind.

—MAHANBY CITY, PA., has 16,000 inhabitants, about 9,000 of whom are Catholics—Roman and Greek. There are 168 licensed saloons in the town—one for every 96 of the population. Of course, the evangelical Protestant churches are neither numerous nor strong. Some of them got together and resolved upon a union evangelistic campaign, and Dr. L. W. Munhall, of Germantown, Philadelphia, was called to conduct it. A tabernacle, large enough to accommodate 2,000, was erected. The campaign lasted nearly six weeks. Upwards of six hundred persons from all classes of the community, including twenty-one Catholics, professed conversion, church members were very greatly revived, and all departments of church work wonderfully stimulated.

—THAT SOCIAL SERVICE may be emphasized in an evangelistic campaign to the advantage of both was clearly demonstrated during the Biederwolf meetings in Watertown, N. Y., in November and December. Mr. Charles Stelzle was invited by Dr. W. E. Biederwolf and the local committee to conduct a social service campaign during the fourth week of the six weeks' evangelistic meetings. Mr. Stelzle opened up his campaign with a great men's meeting on Sunday afternoon, the larger part of the audience crowding the tabernacle being workmen from the mills and factories. Scores of men responded to the appeal to surrender to Jesus Christ. Every day at three, from Monday to Friday, a popular meeting was held in the heart of the city. Mr. Stelzle also spoke to several organizations of men in the city at their regular meetings. Pledge cards upon which were indicated ten different kinds of work which needed to be done by the bank and file in the churches and the city were used in the closing meeting and were signed by more than 500 individuals, many of whom were new converts eager for service. The breadth of the social service appeal in no way marred the direct evangelistic appeal. Indeed, it strengthened it at every point.

AT THE HOBSON UNION REVIVAL meeting, Parlier, Calif., one feature was "Foreigners' Night," when all nationalities were invited to participate. There were nine nationalities and seventeen states represented, and each entered into the service with enthusiasm characteristic of his own race. The purpose was to demonstrate that "God is no respecter of persons, but in every nation he that feareth him and worketh righteousness is accepted with him."

THE PILGRIM KNIGHT

ONE of the rare books of the season, in that it stands in a class by itself, is A Knight of the Cross, by Lawrence B. Saint. It might be termed, not inappropriately, a modernized Pilgrim's Progress. The knight, whose name is that of Bunyan's hero, sets out on a quest to find the way to Peace and Satisfaction. He has the Book of Truth as a guide. Many and great are the adventures that befall him; but protected by the King's Armor—the F. met of Salvation, the Breastplate of Righteousness, and the Sword of the Spirit, and with his Lantern filled with the oil of Prayer, and with an un-failing supply of Heavenly Bread and Living Water, he pushes on courageously. Bad men, in the guise of friends, try to tempt him from the narrow way, and many a sharp battle he has with subtle and open foes. At one stage of his pilgrimage he is led astray and falls into the entanglements of Sin; but when hope seems gone he is fortunately succored and escapes, repentant and more resolved than ever to fight his way through. There are several places of refuge and help along the pilgrim path where the traveler rests and is comforted and encouraged. Serious dangers assail him farther on. He narrowly escapes being trapped by Lord Pride, who plotted to inveigle him to the City of Pride, which he afterward saw crushed for its wickedness. Other perils await him at the gates of the City of Lust, whose inhabitants live wholly for pleasure, whose ruler is a Queen who is pitiless to her victims. Her realm is one of universal indulgence, drinking and carousing. Christian is almost caught in the toils, but is fortunately rescued by a faithful guide, and sheltered in the Tower of the Sanctuary.

Christian's further adventures bring him at last to the High Hill of Suffering, where after an arduous struggle he stands beside the Cross and sees afar, with transports of joy, a vision of the King's City. Henceforward his knight-hood becomes one of service for others until the triumphant close.

The book is well bound and is beautifully illustrated with full-page drawings in color. It is published by Geo. W. Jacobs & Co., Philadelphia.

Boxed Health—Liquid Florida Sunshine in Golden Globes

Florida tree-ripened grapefruit brings into the home a new joy and renewed health. Its cheer reaches from the oldest to the youngest member of the family—it benefits the baby just as much as the grandmother. The insistent charm of the fruit appeals to the young and old alike—it aids digestion, tones the blood, clears the skin. It may be eaten freely by every member of the family—not only for breakfast but at luncheon and dinner as well as "between meals."

When ripened on trees Florida grapefruit has just the right flavor—it is just the right good-morning, just the right good-night, just the right thing for everybody all the time. Buy it by the box and you can afford to use it freely. Be sure to get grapefruit that has been fully ripened on the trees. Look on the boxes and wrappers for this mark in big red letters:

Drink the Juice of These Real Oranges

FLORIDA CITRUS EXCHANGE

Eat These Grapefruit—Nature's Favorite Tonic

Only tree-ripened, rich and juicy grapefruit come in the good as the grapefruit from boxes with this brand. The growers who form the Exchange have united to ripen their fruit on the trees and to market it in a superior way. No matter what grade of fruit you purchase, or what price you pay, if you buy that packed by the Florida Citrus Exchange you will get your money's worth.

Florida's oranges are just as good as the grapefruit from boxes with this brand. They may not always be as smooth and bright on the outside as others, but just cut them! Then you will realize how juicy an orange can be—when you have eaten one or drunk the juice of one you will have a new idea of the flavor, spiciness and juiciness of the orange.

Oranges and grapefruit are both food and drink. In cookery and confections they are the housewife's delight. Booklet of recipes telling you how and when to use these fruits mailed for four cents in stamps. The many new uses described will interest every housewife. Address, Florida Citrus Exchange, 625 Citizens' Bank Building, Tampa, Florida.

THE PRAYER LEAGUE

OUR readers will greatly facilitate the work of the Prayer League if they will take pains to include in every communication their full names and addresses. Letters have been received for Mrs. M. H., of Rochester, N. Y., and Miss E. W., of Missouri. If these friends will send their full names and addresses the letters will be forwarded.

Many friends have written, gratefully to acknowledge answers to prayer. Among them:

E. L., Waterloo, Iowa (for spiritual blessing); L. S., Gloucester, Mass.; Mrs. B. V., Copenhagen, N. Y.; Mrs. A. N. (for state-wide prohibition in Colorado and success of Evangelist Sunday's revival campaign in Denver, at which over 10,000 were converted); A Reader, Colorado, who writes: "I believe God is forgiving and helping me"; Mrs. F. B. H. (for salvation of loved ones); Mrs. M. K. D. (for answer to many prayers and for renewal of a friendship); Mrs. C. C., Milton Junction, Wis.; A Subscriber, Keokuk, Iowa (for recovery of mother from a severe illness); Mrs. C. H. G., Osgood, Iowa; Mrs. H. A. W., Missoula, Mont. (for better health); Miss E. F. M., Anthon, Iowa (for lifting of a heavy burden, relief for a sister and answers to many other prayers); J. M., Locust Ridge, La. (for answer to many prayers); "In His Name," Washington; C. S., Green Ridge, Mo. (for prayers answered "times without number"); Mr. and Mrs. S. S., Unionville, Mo.; Mrs. E. S. A., Louisville, Ky. (for bringing husband, little son and self home safe from Europe); E. S., Rev. M. M. S. (for a great spiritual awakening and conversion of many souls and additions to the churches at Saluda, N. C.); Mrs. E. D. (for restoration of husband's health); A Reader, Blacksburg, S. C.; X. Y. Z., Upper Sandusky, Ohio; C. L. H., Kingman, Ariz.; C. E. S., Berlin, Mass.; C. A. W., Baltimore, Md.; A Reader, Syracuse, N. Y. (for lifting of a "terrible burden"); M. J. S., Berkeley, Cal.; Mrs. E. G., Cumberland Gap, Tenn.; H. E. P., Saegertown, Pa.; Mrs. F. C. Y., Clinton Corners, N. Y.; A Reader in Michigan; Mrs. T. C. H. (for improved health); Mrs. M. M. B., Kendall, Wash.; Mrs. A. M., Petersburg, Va. (for answers better than her prayers—a greater work to do instead of having her place restored; also a home for self and husband); Mrs. S. E. B., Eaton Rapids, Mich. (for restoration of husband's health; Mrs. L. B. C., who says: "Some weeks ago I wrote you to pray for my son to be restored to the church and live a different life, and I rejoice today to write that that prayer has been answered. He is now in the church and living as a Christian should."

The following telegram came recently from Mr. H. M., of Kalama, Wash.: "Pray for boy lost in Washington forest. Urgent. Parents prostrated." The telegram was at once telephoned to the Bowery Mission and the Fulton Street noonday prayer meeting. Our readers will join in this prayer, but we confidently hope that before this page reaches them the lost boy will have been found. A sad letter comes from a mother, who asks special prayer that a daughter who is insane and also afflicted with tuberculosis may marvelously be healed. S. V., who is in great mental distress, asks prayers for healing.

A Southern Mother asks prayer that her son may return home and be delivered from a sin which has great power over him. Another reader asks prayer that a friend may hear from her son who mysteriously disappeared about eight years ago; another, that husband may be reconciled to her; another that a young couple may be united and a heavy cloud lifted from them; a woman, "that God may give me a child"; another woman that God may provide a home for her, that she may have the comforts of life; another that her husband may return.

Prayers are asked for revivals of religion at Evanston, Ill.; Hudson, Iowa; Montverde, Fla.; Hamilton, Ohio; Cambridge, Mass. Prayers are asked for blessing upon the Summerfield Methodist Episcopal Church, Newark, N. J., and the church in Emerick, Neb. Mrs. G. F. D. asks prayers that a cold church may become a living fire for the salvation of souls; Mrs. J. B. S., for blessing on a home devoted to the care of girls.

Thirteen friends ask prayer for mental restoration or strengthening for friends, relatives or themselves.

Prayers are asked for the restoration or strengthening of sight for eighteen persons who are wholly or partially blind.

Thirty-two friends ask prayer for a deeper work of grace, assurance of sins forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing.

Prayer is asked that twenty-four persons may be saved from the liquor habit and three from the drug habit.

Thirty-three parents ask prayer for the conversion of sons, including one mother who asks prayer that four sons may be saved.

Fourteen wives ask prayer for the conversion of their husbands.

Thirty-nine friends ask prayer for the conversion of other relatives and friends, including one man who asks that two brothers, both over eighty years of age, may be saved.

Nineteen readers ask prayer for special spiritual blessing for relatives or friends.

Seven sons and daughters ask prayer for the healing of mothers; three for the healing of fathers; six mothers and fathers for the healing of sons; eleven for the healing of daughters, including one mother that daughter may be cured of insanity and tuberculosis, and another mother that daughter may regain use of her limbs; twelve wives ask prayer for the healing of husbands; four friends ask prayer for the healing of brothers; eight for the healing of sisters; forty-three for healing for themselves; thirty for the healing of other relatives and friends, including one that a friend's child may be restored and enabled to walk, and another that two who have cancer may be cured.

Nine friends ask prayer for healing of hearing for themselves or other friends.

Twenty-nine friends ask prayer for help or guidance in financial affairs.

Fifty-six friends ask prayer for the granting of varied desires and needs, including a mother, that she may hear from her daughter and that she may be restored to her, also to hear from her own brother.

GO-TO-CHURCH BAND

THE Go-to-Church Band can do more than simply gain the voluntary presence of young people and children at the preaching service. For many churches are training the children to contribute regularly to the support of the church and its benevolences. The Old South Church, Worcester, Mass., has taken especial pains to induce the children of the band to use its weekly offering envelope system, and the results are that this year, for the first time in its history, the church has run short of envelopes.

Young people take up the task of making a perfect record at church going with more enthusiasm and in greater numbers than the average pastor expects. The Phillips Church of South Boston, Mass., organized a successful band in the fall of 1913; last spring the pastor was called to the North Church, St. Johnsbury, Vt., and this autumn he started a band there and ordered supplies. They were taken so rapidly that in two weeks he was forced to send for a further supply, and then ten days later the third. This shows that young people go to church in unexpectedly large numbers if they are given the chance at something difficult. Details regarding the organization of a Go-to-Church Band can be obtained from Clinton Alvord, 7 Summer Street, Worcester, Mass.

Search-no-farther Books

Your hunt for the right books to give or to own can end right here. These books will be permanently welcomed in any home. You will make no mistake in selecting one or more as gifts at any season or for your reading table.

FRIENDS O' MINE is a book you will like in spots, and like better in other spots, and best of all in certain spots. In other words, the whole book will hold you no matter who you are, or how old or young. It is an unusual book of which this can be said, and Miss Margaret E. Sangster, Jr., is indeed an unusual writer. Just as did her famous grandmother before her, she is making a host of enthusiastic friends. The majority of the somewhat more than one hundred short stories, sketches and poems in Friends o' Mine have never before been published, and, of course, will not be, excepting in this form. So you want this book. We want you to have it. We have published it because it is unusually worth while.

THE FAMILY ALTAR CALENDAR

It is a fact widely testified to that chance Scripture passages have again and again proven a direct blessing in the lives of men or women. We have selected for each daily leaf of this calendar a text with a five-minute sermon, a Scripture reading and a prayer. The whole seems exactly right for individual or family use in the daily worship. Naught but good can follow the use of this collection—what more shall be said in its favor as a gift to your friend or a companion for yourself?

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD RED LETTER BIBLE OR TESTAMENT

There is but one thing to say about these new famous Red Letter Bibles and Testaments, and that is a question: Do you possess one? If you answer "Yes," there remains this to ask: Have you a friend who does not possess one? If to either of these questions you answer "No," we have this to say:

We will send the MINION RED LETTER BIBLE postpaid with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one full year for $3.00. For a better binding add $1.00 to the above price. We will send the RED LETTER TESTAMENT postpaid with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one full year for $2.00. When ordering state whether you want Authorized or Revised Version.

In the Old Testament all references to Christ—the Messiah—are printed in red; in the New Testament all the words uttered by Christ are printed in red. The effect of this upon the reader is intensely inspiring, and, from a student view point, peculiarly helpful.

Questions and Answers

Reader. "To what or to whom does the word 'these' refer in Jesus' question to Peter in John 21: 16: 'Lovest thou me more than these?'"

It is just as impossible in Greek as in English to tell whether the word "these," as it is used here, refers to persons or to things. In some cases it would be evident, because the form of the pronoun differs in different genders and numbers. But this is the genitive plural, and the form is alike for all genders. It is likely that Jesus indicated by his question that he meant "more than these other disciples." That is, "Do you love me more than they love me?" He probably refers to Peter's boast that although he had forsaken the Master he himself would remain true, implying that he loved him more than any of the rest. But in answering the question now Peter does not repeat his boast. He merely says: "Thou knowest that I love thee." There is the possibility, however, that Jesus meant: "Do you love me more than you love these other men?" or "Do you love me more than you love these earthly things and things?"

Reader. You will find the questions you mention and a great many others dealt with satisfactorily in the new book, 555 Difficult Bible Questions Answered, just issued by the Christian Herald. We could wish that every reader of this paper might have a copy of it at hand, for reference whenever a Bible difficulty is encountered. It deals with just the kind of Bible questions that are constantly arising, and is a valuable time-saver. You can send for it by enclosing 35 cents when renewing your subscription.

Minnesota Subscriber. 1. Do you think a non-Christian can hold an office in the Sunday school as secretary or treasurer? 2. Could he be the superintendent or a teacher?

As a rule it is better to have all the Sunday school offices filled by active Christians, but there are none available for such offices as are really secular, like those you mention, a moral and religious person who has the required ability but who may not be a professing Christian may be allowed to hold the office. There is probably no rule in any denomination forbidding such an appointment. And very often, when such a work is given an unconverted young person, he is led to take an interest in spiritual things and becomes an experimental Christian. 2. The superintendent should by all means be an out-and-out Christian. Some denominations, perhaps, do not demand that the appointment of the superintendent be ratified by the official board of the church. The teachers, too, while we know no denomination making this a positive requirement, should all be Christians. There is no doubt far too much laxity in this matter. The chief business of Sunday school teachers is to lead the children to Christ they should all means be themselves Christians. There are very few exceptions, in which an earnest, thoughtful person, who is seeking the gift of salvation but has not yet experienced its positive joys, may be allowed to teach. But in these rare exceptions the requirement of a body of converted teachers should be enforced.

J. S. P., Saratoga, N. Y. The passage in Luke 2: 1-3, which was formerly so frequently quoted by a certain class of Bible critics as a blunder on the part of the Gospel historian, as in recent years received unexpected confirmation. It was claimed that Luke's statement regarding a Roman census of Judea was a pure invention and that Cyrenius was a myth. Now, however, it has been discovered by historians and excavators that the entire passage, which has occasioned so much controversy, is literal fact. Sir William Ramsay, the noted archeologist, while excavating at Antioch of Pisidia (in Asia Minor) in 1912-13, unearthed inscriptions which revealed that Cyrenius was the name of the governor of Syria at the period of the Advent. Further, it has been established by careful investigation of ancient historical sources that the Roman authorities took a regular fourteenth-year census, and that under the prevailing law every one at some time within the year had to go and personally register in his native city.

H. P. J., Anamosa, Iowa. The passages in Matt. 24: 34 and Mark 13: 30 are parallel. Commentators take the meaning, according to the usual way of speaking in those days, to be that the generation then existing would not pass away without seeing the beginning of the fulfillment of what had been predicted and should therefore have confidence in the whole ultimately coming to pass. Many prophecies have a double perspective; one relating to events apparently near at hand, and the farther perspective dealing with occurrences very remote. The nearer prediction was fulfilled in the destruction accomplished by Titus, and the dispersion of the Jews under Adrian. As to the time of the fulfillment of further prophecy, we are told in Mark 13: 32 that no man, not even the angels, knoweth the hour.

B. G. L. B., East Pittsburg, Pa. Moving pictures have come to stay, and we should make the best use of them accordingly. Rightly used, they are calculated to be not only a source of entertainment and valuable instruction, but a great and potent aid to morals and good citizenship. Recognizing these facts, churches, colleges and schools are all making use of moving pictures. Besides, there are now Boards of Censorship, national and State, whose business it is to see that no films are permitted which could be regarded as objectionable, and a great many houses of popular amusement are now using pictures of unexceptionable merit, which contain no suggestion of vice or crime. There are good books and bad, good music and much that is trash; but we should not, therefore, discard all music and books, but rather select the wheat from the chaff. This is precisely what is now being done with moving pictures.

Reader, Downey, Calif. 1. It is right to pray for any one you believe to be in need of spiritual or other help which prayer invokes. The fact that you no longer associate with the person need not restrict you in your petitions. We pray for distant friends; why not for distant enemies as well? 2. When you feel discouraged, why not count your blessings? It is a good way to stop praying for any kind of blessing awhile and to devote that particular time to giving thanks for those blessings you have now and those you have enjoyed in the past. We feel sure that this will help you. Another way to get rid of discontent is to go out into the world and do something for somebody who needs it badly. Associate with some one who is engaged in practical Christian work, and you will soon be so deeply interested in helping others, that you will forget all about your own troubles.

Miscellaneous

J. T. D., Delaware, Ohio. The armistice proposition has been definitely rejected, to the great disappointment of many who had hoped that it might be favorably regarded.

H. M. B., Asheville, N. C. We have never heard any explanation of the origin of the custom in certain parts of the South of celebrating Christmas with horns, drums and fire-crackers.

C. J., Leivasy, W. Va. Zech. 14 deals with a prophecy that is yet unfulfilled. It is the last struggle of the forces of righteousness with the hostile world powers. The same topic is dealt with by several other prophets.

A. J. H., Sheridan, Ore. Joshua, according to the estimates of Bible authorities, was born about 1690-93 B.C., and at the time of the taking of Jericho he was about 85 years old. Ahab, king of Israel, is said to have been born about 900 B.C., or nearly 800 years after the time of Joshua.

A. E., Hood River, Ore. The right attitude for Americans to observe in relation to the war is that advised by the President—an open-minded neutrality. It is useless to waste time discussing causes at this stage. Rather we should look ahead, and hope and pray that good may follow, and that the world may be better and wiser when it is all over.

Mrs. G. F., Smithland, Texas. 1. You probably refer to the so-called upas, or poison tree of Java, which is said to exhale a vapor that kills whatever it touches—beast, bird, reptile or plant. It is purely a traditional tree, however, and is not known to modern travelers or to botanical science. 2. We quite agree with you in the exception you take to the book you mention.

A friend in Arkansas (Mrs. T. M. of Ozark) writes, apropos of the relief work in Europe: "Have we not millions here at home who are hungry and cold? Look at the south—the cotton belt here, where I am writing from. We lose $400,000,000 on cotton, and small farmers and renters can't pay for the feed and provision they have already consumed. And the merchants are going to the wall because the farmers are. Our government helped Galveston at the time of the tidal wave, and helped San Francisco, and the sufferers by the Indiana flood, but the cotton belt must get on the best it can."

H. J. P., Edinboro, Pa., and J. C. H., Acotink, Va. A great deal has been written concerning the millennium, and there is a wide difference regarding its interpretation, some holding to the belief in the personal advent of Christ for the purpose of establishing his millennial kingdom, while others contend that "we should look for the triumph of the Gospel on the earth by moral force and by the agency of the Holy Spirit in the soul of man, rather than to expect the reappearance of Christ in person as a ruler." In other words, they believe in a wholly spiritual interpretation, rather than a literal one. If you have access to any church library, you will doubtless find books on the subject, presenting both views.

Plate showing culture of germs collected from the air

Same plate showing no germ-life after use of Formamint

Achoo!—and he sets free millions of germs

WHAT of your own throat, when a person with an infected throat suddenly sneezes beside you? Is it protected? Or must you inhale the germs that your fellow men send flying and take a chance that your system will be able to repel them?

In every crowded place, you know, you are always exposed to just such dangers of infection—not only to sore throat, but to even more dangerous ailments. And that is why over 10,000 physicians advocate the use of Formamint—the germ killing throat tablet.

Dissolving in the mouth with a pleasing and refreshing taste, Formamint releases a germicide that flows with the saliva into every tiny crevice of the throat—destroying the germs, blocking their entrance into the system, and soothing away the irritation.

And coming in such a handy form, Formamint makes it easy for you to give your throat this needful protection—as well as to get prompt relief when the irritation has already set in. But one experience of the gratifying relief that Formamint brings will more than convince you. At all druggists.

Forget for a minute that name Studebaker!

Forget the pride that any manufacturer must have in such a name that for 63 years has stood for the highest achievements in vehicles of every nature.

Forget the efforts that any manufacturer would make to keep that hard-won name at the very forefront—

And think only of the Forty Five Millions of Dollars invested in the gigantic plants where Studebaker Cars are built. And then you will see why Studebaker MUST make a good car.

Call it selfishness, if you like. Call it business judgment. Call it what you will—but the fact remains that Forty Five Millions of Dollars invested in any business must be protected no matter what the cost.

And this Forty Five Millions of Dollars invested in Studebaker plants is your guarantee not only that Studebaker CAN give you full money's worth for every dollar of the price, because the Studebaker plants have been made the most complete on the face of the earth;

—but also, that Studebaker MUST make the BEST car that can be built for the price to protect that vast investment.

And it is for this that Studebaker seeks the highest authorities on automobile designing.

It is for this that Studebaker manufactures Studebaker Cars COMPLETE in Studebaker plants—to make sure that each of the hundreds of parts that go to make a car are made of the materials and in the way that Studebaker wants them made.

It is for this that Studebaker guarantees a Service of the highest type. And it is for this that Studebaker in the years gone by has picked and chosen only the best, the most dependable dealers who could insure the giving of such service. It is, in brief

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

A WEEKLY ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER FOR THE HOME

WITH THE WIDOWS AND FATHERLESS

THE second instalment of the personal narrative of Mr. Theodore Waters, secretary of the Christian Herald, who recently returned from visiting the scenes of suffering in Europe caused by the war, in the interests of the Christian Herald Fund for the Relief of the Widows and Orphans, closed with what he witnessed in Belgium. This, the third article, confirms the reports that dire hardship has been visited upon other sections of Europe by this conflict. We keenly regret the continued delay in the receipt of the special photographs, which should have been in our hands weeks ago and the whereabouts of which we do not know, as there has been some unexplained interruption in their transmission from Europe.—Editor.]

THE eyes of the kind-hearted people of the United States have been cast on the miseries of the people of Belgium. But we must not forget that Belgium is only one of the fields of warfare; that quite as great if not greater battles have been fought on the eastern front of the German-Austrian empires. Indeed, Galicia has been ravaged, her people driven and starved in as great numbers as those of Belgium. First the Russians invaded the country and lived on it as they swept everything before them. The Russians, used to being driven at home, drove when abroad, and the result was not good for the people of the country, especially the women. Naturally they lived on the country and took all the food they could find; and the inhabitants, their houses leveled, their horses commandeered, their food supplies taken from them, and the terror of the Tartar urging them on, fled as fast into Austro-Germany as the growing impedimenta of women and many children would let them. Naturally they met Germans on the way, Germans in ever-increasing numbers, who, ruthless with the purpose of warfare, pressed through and over them; and so, to paraphrase Kipling, "some of them lived," and some of them, no one knows how many, died. They were deflected, shunted, scattered over the roads. They were caught, as it were, between the Scylla and Charybdis of the Tartar on the one hand, the Teuton on the other. Those who got by were happy in reaching the bigger cities of Austria, where they arrived stranded and dependent on the people of those places, but without the sympathy or help of the people of the outside world, who realized little or nothing of what was happening. For those who could not flee greater terrors and miseries were in store.

For many years there had lived a German army officer whose specialty had been the study of the very country through which the Russians were fighting their way. Part of this country, Eastern Prussia, was a veritable swamp, a region of morasses, where roads led between quicksands and where to lose one's way meant death. Few people ever threaded their way through these swamps, but this army officer, Count von Hindenburg by name, spent every moment of his spare time for years studying them. It was his theory that if ever the Russians attacked his fatherland they would almost certainly follow the roads leading past these swamps, and that with a little manipulation they could be driven into them and drowned. It was a neat little plan for wholesale destruction and Von Hindenburg devoted practically his whole life to it. While fellow officers were spending their leaves of absence in pleasure resorts, Von Hindenburg spent his vacations in the swamps. It was said that he knew every tree, road and quicksand in the region. It was his hobby and through it he came to be known to his fellow officers as "Swampy Hindenburg."

Time went on and Von Hindenburg perfected his knowledge of Eastern Prussia and of the surrounding region, but no war with Russia came to give him a chance to put it into practice. And by and by he grew old and was retired, and while his researches were on record they had almost been forgotten when the present war broke out. But when man army came on in one grand drive, and the Russians, facing annihilation by bullets on the one hand, were forced into the swamps on the other.

I was told this story in Vienna, and there it was said that the despairing yells of the Russian troops as they found themselves being driven into the waters of the swamps literally drowned the noise of the guns. Be that as it may, nearly all those who were not captured were drowned, and thus was brought about the big victory over the Russians of which the United States was informed some time ago.

But in the meantime the poor people of the adjacent country, the widows and the orphans, all those who had not fled before the first approach of the Russians, had suffered a second time under the onrush of the Germans. If the Russians had left any food in the first place the Germans had taken it in the second. It seemed as though not a single loaf of bread remained, not a stand of beef, not even a horse on which, in the last resort, one might feed.

Again a stream of refugees started towards Austria. They literally starved by the way, for the army had lived on the country through which they were passing. And some of them died, the weaklings naturally first, and women and little children are notable weaklings when war gets in its work.

Even after this double experience people remained on the sites of their homes until it was reported that a new force of Russians were coming to sweep through the country again, as indeed they did, succeeding in pushing the Germans far back from the place where their lost comrades had been swept into the swamps. This was the last straw. Even the love of homes destroyed was not proof against it, and so the final procession got in motion, gathering force of numbers as the news of the Russian approach was passed along. People pushed little carts holding all they had saved from the wreck of their homes. If there were babies, the babies lay wailing in the carts. Sometimes a woman, worn out with the day's march, slept heavily on a pile of household utensils. When nearer the goal of their desires it was possible for some of them to get onto trains and these rolled slowly into Vienna and Berlin and the refugees were quartered in halls and buildings by the government, and when these were overflowing, on the householders themselves.

It was notable that whereas in Belgium, the great war storm having passed over, refugees could be seen returning by thousands to their villages, in Galicia there are no such examples. These invasions of two armies have swept the country clean and there is nothing left to go back to. Even the Arab has a home attraction in a tent, however much he may move it about; but these people have not even a tent. The nomad's lot in life is rich compared with theirs. Some are in Austria; some have come all the way to Germany. What the future holds for them will depend on the generosity of the American people.

[The Christian Herald Relief Fund for the Widows and Orphans of the War embraces all the countries in which suffering is caused and will be applied as far as facilities make it possible proportionately to the extent of the need. So far as the world knows as yet, Belgium has the first claim upon Christian charity, though not an exclusive claim. On our editorial page will be found mention of a second remittance, $50,000, to Europe for distribution by four of our relief committees. We await special information to release additional sums.—Editor.]

the Russians began to press back the German forces some one, said to be Emperor Wilhelm himself, suddenly recollected. The records were found and Hindenburg was sent for and asked to direct the operations of the German army against the Russians. His ideas were put into practice and by the most skilful operations the Russians were forced gradually but certainly towards the swamps. They themselves did not know what was to happen to the Germans far back from the place where their lost comrades had been swept into the swamps. This was the last straw. Even the love of homes destroyed was not proof against it, and so the final procession got in motion, gathering force of numbers as the news of the Russian approach was passed along. People pushed little carts holding all they had saved from the wreck of their homes. If there were babies, the babies lay wailing in the them. There would be attacks and retreats, apparently to them without reason, but it came to pass at last that they found themselves with the Germans opposing them on all sides but one, and that one side was the swamp region. Ever and ever the Germans pressed forward. Whenever they gave way reinforcements always came up and the Russians were relentlessly pushed toward the morasses. At last came the time when the whole Ger-

THE WITNESSES AND THE RACE

A SERMON BY REV. W. JASPER HOWELL, M.A.*

"Therefore let us also, seeing we are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses, lay aside every weight, . . . looking unto Jesus, the author and perfecter of our faith." Heb. 12: 1, 2, R.V.

CHRISTIAN experience pursues a flying goal. Excellence may be a present achievement, perfection is ever in front of us as a future reality. What are our impediments and who are our onlookers? Impediments hinder the runner, and tend to moral failure. On the other hand, sympathetic onlookers give inspiration, and so lead to moral victory. They impart their ideals of goodness to those who struggle in their presence, and thus counteract those impediments that would lead the wavering toward a moral defeat. As the athlete presses on toward his goal in the distance, he finds a new strength for endurance in the inspiration of a cheering, encouraging and expectant multitude that looks down upon him in his heroic physical struggle.

This epistle was written to a church of wavering Hebrew Christians. They were upon the point of apostasy. They were no longer steadfast, but were about to return to Judaism, out of which they had come. The entire church was upon the verge of backsliding.

Encouragement, Not Disparagement, Needed

Just as new citizens of our own country often feel homesickness for their fatherland, so these new converts looked wistfully back to the religion of their fathers. The purpose of the author of this letter to these Christians was to instruct them and to establish them in their new faith and to prevent their lapse from faith in Jesus as the Messiah.

The Christian writer courteously approaches his readers. He does not disparage that which they love. He does not underestimate that which controls and attracts them. This author apostle saw more in their national history than even they themselves saw. Beginning with righteous Abel, he gives in an appreciative review this marvelous and thrilling recital of their heroes of faith. He recognized the beautiful and the true in a lower standard. The theologian need not despise the prayer of a child because it is immature.

Apostolic preaching, like that of Jesus, also was based upon what they saw. Their preaching was prompted by the problems in their religious situation. Jesus was the apt preacher. He was a preacher of observation. The dull preacher is one who depends entirely upon his books. Paul was forceful, because he was a student of human nature and a preacher from observation. This characterized him as a missionary in Corinth, Ephesus and cities of Asia Minor. In these cities, Grecian citizens celebrated their national athletic games. The imagery of the text is Grecian in its reference to the amphitheater and the cloud of witnesses. The imagery of the text suggests a Greek vase with a Christian flower. The apostle says: "O Hebrew Christian, behold yonder Grecian amphitheater!" He himself constructs an imaginary amphitheater, in which he seats the martyrs and confessors of the faith from Abel to Jesus. He then calls the roll of their heroes of faith and sacrifice. The invisible witnesses—the grand procession of believing ancestors—rekindles their expiring enthusiasm. The apostle thus cheers and inspires his readers who are acting in the arena of faith under the observation of a heavenly throng of beholders.

He who would really win in any race must drop all that clogs the step. The man with only one impediment loses his race as sadly as the man who has a multitude. It is not necessary to destroy all the machinery of a steamer in order to render it unfit for an ocean voyage. To disarrange only one vital part of that machinery renders the great steamer helpless. One leak will sink the most powerful ship that sails the sea. So one impediment—one besetting sin—will defeat the Christian who leaves it chained to his side.

The physical athlete is often wiser than the Christian athlete. His self-denial in diet and discipline in exercise suggests that the Christian's experience is also a discipline. The great requisite in the trades and professions is apprenticeship and experience. The inexperienced man does not instantly become superintendent of a great factory. The captains of industry served their apprenticeship. It is the experience in the intervening grades that makes an administrator. He who takes the highest seat may be asked to descend. The greatest preachers in the cities began modestly. Dr. Hillis was first a missionary on the frontier. Gipsy Smith began in a Salvation Army hall.

The Inspiration of Sympathy

Every life draws its moral strength from some inspiration. The responsiveness of a congregation makes the sermon effective. Many a preacher gets his passion of delivery from the eloquence of his hearers. The preacher becomes earnest when he has his eye on a discouraged man and wants to make him willing to live a week longer. It is the occasion that makes the orator. In the reply of Webster to Hayne, the occasion stirred his great memory and all his information passed before his mind like a panorama when he reached up for a thunderbolt and hurled it in impassioned eloquence.

The happiness of one individual is the happiness of many others. The realized expectations of any man means that also for all his friends. The disappointment of one is the disappointment of those who love him and believe in him. Sin in this sense is social. The innocent mother suffers for the guilty son. No one is absolutely lost so long as one good man is left to strive in his behalf. No one is saved so as to be beyond danger of receiving moral injury while any evil-doers are left to work their own moral undoing and that of others. If a son fails in moral or in business, the father fails of his expectation. If the student fails, he reflects upon his college. If the convert or Christian worker fails he stabs the honor of the whole church.

No man liveth to himself and no man dieth to himself. Every man has an influence. We cannot go alone into eternity. Much less can we go to heaven empty-handed. The failure of one bank may cause a panic. The moral failure of one man may cause many others to topple down. If one man stand firm in his moral life for one half a century he may have prevented hundreds from falling away from ideal behavior.

Lessons from the Past

The text exhorts us to use past experiences and memories in our present striving. Take a backward look into your own personal experiences. There were noble vows in those past years. In every life, there have been holy scenes and sacred memories. The imagination can objectify the past and make it live again. Bring the sainted mother back to your daily experiences that she may touch your life for good as in past years. Now in the great city far from the homestead of your childhood imagine yourself there again. Then you aimed to live a noble life. Have you fulfilled that early vision? If you have an old family album open it. Look upon the faces of those who have passed out of your life. Let the faces deter you from intended wrong.

It would be a great loss in one's character if the day of his conversion were also the day of his death. If an infant dies it never can have the experiences of childhood, youth and manhood. It is only by our experiences after conversion that we can grow in moral stature and inspire others.

Looking unto Jesus is the secret of moral growth. For one look at self take ten looks at Jesus. One gradually becomes like that at which he looks. No life can ever rise higher than its ideals. Not failure but low aim is crime. Do not judge a man by what he does but by what he longs to do and become. The race is "set before us." Do not face the failures of yesterday. Face tomorrow's possibilities. Turn over an unblotted page. Anticipation is the mainspring of life. Let anticipation do its perfect work.

Every man's life is a plan of God. A good providence has planned our future years. Let us study closely the map of our lives that God's providence has made. Christlikeness is our goal. "We know not what we shall be, but we know that when he shall appear we shall be like him."

NEWS FROM ALL PARTS OF THE FIELD

—IT IS ANNOUNCED that Evangelist W. E. Biederwolf and Rev. Charles Stelzle will work together in an evangelistic tour, success having already attended their joint efforts in more than one locality. Both men are known across the continent.

—CHRISTIAN RELIGIOUS ORGANIZATIONS are to occupy considerable space at the Panama-Pacific Exposition, and will have notable exhibits, conduct evangelistic and other services, and in many ways endeavor to make a deep spiritual impression on the ever-changing multitude that is expected to stream through the grounds.

—THE MISSIONARY REVIEW OF THE WORLD states that there is one ordained minister to every 594 people in the United States; one to every 82,152 in Africa; one to 123,711 in Korea; one to 172,538 in Japan; one to 321,448 in India; one to 476,462 in China. In other words, there are not enough ordained ministers to go around. What is the answer?

—BEGINNING EARLY in January and continuing until Easter, churches of all denominations in Massachusetts will make a concerted "appeal for personal consecration to the service of God and man," following a strong recommendation by the Federation of Churches of that state "in view of the increasing unity of the churches and the deepening sense of social obligation, and the general seriousness of mind created by momentous international events."

—AT THE CONVENTION of a comparatively new but already influential organization within the Baptist body, the State Secretaries and Superintendents Association, held in Cleveland, the question of open membership in local Baptist churches received attention in a discussion of the subject, "Is There a Place in Baptist Polity for a Community Church?" While open membership was not approved, it was strongly urged that Baptists find a way to unite the entire Christian strength of a community under Baptist leadership when conditions indicated such a duty.

—A RELIGIOUS SURVEY OF SOUTH AMERICA has been projected by the Disciples of Christ, with a view to comprehensive steps in the near future for bringing the peoples of that continent and of Central America into closer spiritual fellowship with North America. A Commission on Latin America will report on conditions in the countries to the south of us and on ways and means for reaching them with the message of Christian fellowship.

—THE WORLD'S SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION is also interested in getting results in South America, and on January 21 a party composed mostly of Christian business men headed by H. J. Heinz expects to sail from New York to tour South America for the purpose of stimulating the work and perfecting the Sunday school organizations of the South American republics. Frank L. Brown, George E. Hall, W. N. Hartshorn, and Harry Morton (of San Francisco) are in the party.

—THE EPISCOPAL CHURCH OF ST. PETER'S, Chinese, in Honolulu, was recently consecrated, free from debt, after long waiting, and the Churchman declares that the service cannot be duplicated outside of Honolulu. A young Chinese who was born and educated in the islands played the organ, the choir was composed of Chinese native to Honolulu, the hymns were sung by whites and Chinese each in their own language, and the Bible sermon was repeated in Chinese after the preacher had finished.

—IN THE ONE HUNDRED AND TENTH YEAR just closed of the British and Foreign Bible Society portions of the Bible were printed for the first time in the following tongues: Kopu in southwest China; Mawken, in Lower Burma; Manchad, western Tibet; Car Nicobarese, an island dialect, Bay of Bengal; Addo, Southern Nigeria; Ruanda, the language of millions of negroes in German East Africa. Nearly nine million Bibles or portions were issued in 456 different tongues, including 35 in raised type for the blind.

—IN COURTESY TO THE State Department at Washington, which has taken the trouble to repeat to the Christian Herald by telegram a cable message from United States Consul General Hanna at Monterey, Mexico, we publish Mr. Hanna's cablegram herewith: "December 28, ten P.M. The American Red Cross suggests that I write them concerning the needs of the poor in this part of Mexico. As mail is so slow and uncertain, please give this telegram to Red Cross. I now have five hundred families on my list in Monterey who are being furnished corn, beans and rice twice a week. There are a thousand more families who want tickets to the relief station. There are probably more than two thousand families in Monterey who need help now and the prospects are that several thousand will be very hungry before January is past. The Mexican authorities are interested and doing what they can, but after four years of war during which the fields have been neglected or gone untilled the crops are very short and the local supply almost exhausted. I have purchased what corn I could and the ladies of San Antonio sent a car of supplies for Christmas. I need for Monterey and nearby towns two cars of corn each week. We need a car load of beans and rice each week. All such consigned to me via Laredo will be entered at Mexican custom house free and free freight on Mexican railroad. We wish every town in the cotton states would buy a bale of cotton blankets and send them to Mexico, for these people have very little clothing, are awfully cold. The food situation is evidently worse here than in Europe, where big harvests were gathered last fall. Please also furnish a copy of this to Dr. Sandison, Christian Herald, New York City."

DAILY MEDITATION

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR. LED BY REV. J. H. JOWETT, D.D., F. B. MEYER,

The Noisome Pestilence

SUNDAY, January 17. Psalm 91. "He shall deliver thee from . . . the noisome pestilence." It is one thing to deliver us from the influence of acts; it is a deeper thing to deliver us from the influence of an atmosphere. There are forces which operate like air; they besiege us like atmospheres. We may escape the blighting influence of some particular member of a club; but it is a more difficult thing to find escape from the influence of the club itself. There are antagonisms which are like climates. We draw our breath in hostilities. There is the climate of worldliness. There is the air of rivalry. There is the pestilence of vulgarity. Sometimes our spiritual enemy is discovered in the spirit of the age. The surrounding air can be foul or fair, and our very breathing may be a minister of enervation or strength.

Now, we have the promise of the Lord to provide a defense against a pestilential atmosphere. He is our sufficiency against evil infection. And how is our safety effected? By making it possible for a man to carry his own defensive atmosphere into the most destructive climate. Our firemen are now provided with helmets, in which they can carry fresh air with them into the thick smoke of desolating fires. In the suffocating fumes the fireman breathes at ease. And so is it in the choking, dulling atmosphere of the world; we can take our own climate with us, and we can breathe the air of heaven even amid the most noxious fumes of sin.

Dr. George Adam Smith gives this significant rendering of a familiar phrase in the book of Isaiah: "He shall draw in breath in the fear of the Lord." A man who does that is breathing mountain air, wherever he is. No plague shall come nigh his dwelling. He is immune from the noisome pestilence. His spiritual atmosphere is the breath of the Holy Ghost. J. H. J.

Christ in Our Lives

MONDAY, January 18. Isaiah 2: 12-22. "The Lord alone shall be exalted in that day." The shaking which Isaiah foresaw looming on his fatherland is the type of a greater overthrow which must befall the present system of modern civilization. In what way and at what day or hour, even the most prescient among us cannot forecast; but that day of the Lord will be upon all that is proud and haughty and lifted up. The loftiness of men shall be made low, and the one element to emerge from the general overthrow and to become the keystone of the new order which is to succeed, will be the exaltation of the Son of God. "The Lord alone shall be exalted in that day." In the name of Jesus every knee shall bow and every tongue confess that he is Lord. Great voices in heaven shall cry, "The kingdom of the world is become the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ, and he shall reign forever."

With this touchstone we can test the theologies, institutions, and movements of our time. The one question about them is, Do they exalt Christ? Do they add to his honor and glory? If not, they are idols, i. e., appearances, which shall pass utterly away. With this thought in our minds let us examine our lives. Christ must be central and first. At his throne, albeit that he is our Friend and Saviour, we must prostrate ourselves continually. When he is supreme with us, everything that is natural, beautiful, and human will fall into its right place; otherwise we expose ourselves to the leveling of the day of the Lord of Hosts, which will spare neither cedar nor oak. F. B. M.

Faith for Great Undertakings

TUESDAY, January 19. Luke 5: 4. "Launch out into the deep and let down your nets for a draught." The Master gave orders that seemed to be unbelievably useless. The disciples had toiled through the night. They had failed. But the Master suggests that they push out into the deep for a new, for a greater trial.

A business man in a great city said recently that he failed because his business was on too small a scale. It involved a few hundred thousand dollars. If he had attempted a half-million dollar proposition, he might have engaged the attention of the financiers of the city. His faith was not sufficiently great to prompt a great endeavor. The ability to secure the help of God is largely dependent upon our need of that help and our need is dependent frequently upon the greatness of our task. Get something great to do—something so great and so difficult that you can not do it alone—and you will be driven to the almightiness of God. Did you ever attempt to do anything you could not do alone? Is your ideal perfection, or merely to do things as well as the average person? It is told that the old hammermaker became widely known because his motto was, "I shall make hammers so perfect that no man can for a moment question that I am not the best hammermaker in the country."

The life of most great men depends upon what they have faith to believe they can do with God. Ruskin once said that "the greatest thing a man can do in this world is to see something." The great Christian has invariably been the man who has seen things greater than has the average man, because his eyes have been adjusted to the possibilities of his powers, augmented by the power of God. "Launch out into the deep!" These words apply to our own particular mission in life, be that small or great; we may then add the phrase "nothing is impossible to God." C. S. C.

Keeping in Touch with Christ

WEDNESDAY, January 20. John 1: 35-51. "Thou shalt see greater things than these." It is hardly open to question that this guileless Israelite, sitting beneath the broad-leaved fig-tree in the heat of the day, was meditating on Jacob's vision of the ladder, which linked his stone-pillow with the starry heights. Probably he realized that for him also there were steps up to heaven, and angels descending, that they might help him to ascend nearer to God. The Lord had read his heart and offered himself as the true Ladder, of which Jacob's was a dream, that by him his soul might climb to higher heights than were possible under the old covenant.

Have you caught the vision of a nobler, purer, and more useful life? Jesus has read your heart and offers his help. He is the Way, the Truth, and the Life. Begin to deal at first hand with him. Don't look down to see if you are climbing! Don't compare yourself with yourself or others! Don't trouble about systems or methods! Just keep in touch with Christ; and almost without knowing it, you will find yourself emerging from the horrible pit, breathing purer air, and beholding a farther horizon. It will be as though the bride of an aeronaut should be so absorbed with his presence that she did not realize that the earth had dropped far beneath them, and the stars had drawn nearer. Live in touch with Christ, and he will be always saying, "There is something better, greater, lovelier, just in front; for silver I am bringing gold: thou shalt see greater things than these." F. B. M.

Haste That Fritters Away Opportunities

THURSDAY, January 21. Isaiah 28: 16. "He that believeth shall not make haste." An old man once said to me, "I discovered late in life that God has infinite time in which to accomplish his designs."

In these days of rush and rapid transit, one must often check himself and call to mind that "raw haste is the half-sister to delay." The constant sense of hurry and the feeling that we have no time take the quality and the peace out of life, and moreover exhibit the truth that we do not really trust in God, who speaks to us out of the prophet's mouth, saying, "He that believeth shall not make haste."

A Japanese admiral, while visiting a friend in New York, was one day taking the subway, when his friend said: "Do not take that train; it is a local; the express takes us up town four minutes quicker." "And," said the old admiral, "what do you do with the four minutes?" The man who is always in a hurry does not get time to think about God and his purpose for his life. Our careers are largely determined by the quiet thought and attention we give to them in the presence of God. Fifteen minutes in the morning for Bible study and getting a clear perspective upon our day—God's perspective. "But I have no time in the morning," I hear you say. "I try to get in my Bible study at night." When we argue this way are we not like the soldier who was in such haste to get out to the fight that he rushed off without his gun and shield, and returning at night, tired with defeat, took his weapon, put on his shield and went to bed with them?

Every person has time to save his life from being frittered away on secondary issues. It does not matter if we do not accomplish so many things, providing we do a few things that are truly worth while. C. S. C.

"God's Poems"

FRIDAY, January 22. Ephesians 2: 1-10. "We are his workmanship, created for good works." We do not work up to the Cross, but down from it. We are not saved because we work, but work because we have been saved. A man must be a new creature in Christ Jesus, or his works will be as unacceptable as Cain's offering of the produce of his toil. But it is a comfort to know that the works in which we are to be occupied have been already planned for us. The pattern is there on the mount, and we have only to make all things according to its model. The question is not so much what we are to do, but the faithfulness and diligence with which we do it. There is a path of good works which God has prepared for you to walk in: ask that by his Spirit and providence you may be led into it. Then, whatever your hand finds to do, do it with your might, not to men, but to the Lord.

In this way, you will become one of God's poems. Such is the literal rendering of the word: "We are his poem." As a great poet incarnates his thoughts in separate poems of different lengths and varying meter, so God puts his thoughts into human lives. Longer or shorter lyrics or epics; bright as Milton's L'Allegro, or sad as his Il Penseroso; rugged as Browning, or polished as Gray's Elegy! All is right, if it be his sweet will. Let us set his thought to the music of loving acquiescence and obedience, and give the world the utmost enrichment that our brief spell of mortality can minister. Walk in the path of your good works and you will become a song without words! F. B. M.

The Perfection That Comes Through Suffering

SATURDAY, January 23. Matthew 5: 10. "Blessed are they which are persecuted for righteousness' sake." Sometimes the pathway of life leads through seas of turbulence, deserts of death, plains of hunger, valleys of darkness, prisons of loneliness, storms of sorrow, Gethsemanes of agony and up hills of Calvary. When one reads such inscriptions on the guide-board along life's journey, he may be sure he has not lost his way, or mistaken the path, for his Master's footsteps have marked the path with blood and struggle.

The human heart in great distress often writes for relief of its own anguish, not expecting at the time many readers or great popularity. Such productions bubble up from the inner depths of being, like a perennial fountain, which God has uncovered for a world's refreshment. So Milton, in his blindness, wrote Paradise Lost; Dante, in banishment, the Divine Comedy; Bunyan, in his cell, the Pilgrim's Progress; and Paul, in prisons oft, his immortal Epistles. Persecution polishes the hidden jewels of the soul, that they may find a setting in the lustrous crown of the Master. E. W. C.

American Evangelists in Europe

MR. W. W. ROCK sends the Christian Herald an interesting account of the evangelistic work now going on in England under the personal direction of Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman and his associate, Mr. Chas. M. Alexander. "Wherever the great military training camps are pitched," he writes, "you will find a big marquee, with the triangular sign of the Y. M. C. A. written large above it. Within are a temperance buffet, a post card stall, writing tables, with a good supply of stationery, and other conveniences for the men. The greater portion of the tent is reserved as a meeting room where the Gospel may be preached and sung." The two evangelists visit the camps and speak to great audiences in the big marquee tents. Inside, stretching back from the rickety platform, are masses of khaki-clad soldiers, some sitting on the grass floor, a few of the more fortunate reclining in camp chairs, but the majority wedged into a solid phalanx. The singing is greatly enjoyed. One chorus after another is rendered, Mr. Alexander singing himself the tune through first, that his audience might learn it, and the men hardly suffer him to finish, so quick are they to catch the air, so eager to sing it.

Some of the men perhaps will remember those stirring appeals of Dr. Chapman in days ahead on the battlefield when face to face with the grim reality of war, and with death imminent day and night, they may yet "believe" and be saved.

The Great Crusade

APPARENTLY by common consent, many leading churches on the last Sunday of the old year took as their sermonic theme the war and the general desire for world-peace. Throughout, the discourses were sympathetic with regard to the universal suffering, and all were condemnatory of the evils of war. The lesson drawn from the present conflict was that it was an outgrowth of non-religion and over-confidence in the protective power of civilization; but that, in its reaction, it was the strongest and most convincing argument for international peace and amity the world has ever known. Some of the preachers expressed the confident hope of world-peace in the indefinite future. Few if any of them, however, seemed to grasp the fact that the opportune moment to make a beginning is now—that if a beginning must be made, there is no time so propitious as the present.

In this, as in many other great measures of reform, the pew has led the pulpit. Dr. Charles W. Eliot in an article in the Cosmopolitan Student says of the churches that they are all alike in this respect, and that "so far as a definite and universal peace is concerned, one form of Christianity is as good as another, and all are helpless."

We take issue with this general conclusion. The Church of Christ is not helpless in the great struggle for world-peace. It must take its rightful place in a movement that should call forth its highest energies. In his series of remarkable articles published in the Christian Herald, Dr. Crane has shown the way in which preachers and laymen and all of God's people may vitalize the great peace movement that has already set in in this country and which we believe to be destined to spread to other lands. It is true, as Dr. Eliot has remarked, that there can be no short road to general peace; but from the first step along that road, the way grows shorter. Every foot of that road must be trodden some time; why not begin to tread it now?

Multitudes are rising to appeal to President Wilson and Congress to take up the crusade for world-peace in earnest. Public opinion in behalf of such a course will grow until it becomes irresistible. We can already foresee the day when the foundation will have been laid for a permanent World-Peace Congress on America's initiative.

Coincident with the movement in the United States comes the suggestion from Venezuela of a World Conference in Washington to consider the problems of war; but the greatest problem that now demands attention is the abolition of war itself. To grapple with this momentous question we must assemble the combined wisdom of the nations. Even if such a congress should prove impotent to deal with the present conflict, it could lay foundation for the future. After this war, the nations will be so spent and exhausted that they will welcome the call to the peaceful adjustment of all future quarrels.

We repeat, therefore, our urgent request to the Christian Herald readers to persevere in the course on which they have entered. We have the best reasons for believing that President Wilson regards the movement looking to world peace with cordial approval. The nation's desire is expressed in these memorials to Congress which are now being sent in with thousands of signatures. Public opinion is omnipotent; the voice of the people is a mandate to our legislators and will stir them to a practical appreciation of the greatness of the opportunity.

Ours is the work of seed-sowing and of tillage; we must look to God for the harvest.

No Friction with England

THERE has been some tendency, both in America and England, to over-emphasize the firmness of President Wilson's recent note to Great Britain, in which he insisted upon a change in the present treatment of American commerce. The government officials of Great Britain understand the friendly spirit in which the note was sent, and can have no objections to its requirements, for they are those already established by international law and insisted upon by Great Britain herself during the Boer War. They grant the right of search but refuse the right of seizure for further examination except on "clear and decisive evidence" of the presence of contraband cargo. Full examination must be prompt and a vessel conveyed to any British port for such examination must not be unduly detained.

There can be no rupture between Columbia and Britannia. Our hundred years of peace are merely a preface to many centuries of peace. It is unthinkable that we should ever again be involved in strife with our mother country. The British people, as well as the British Government, must remain assured of our friendliest regard.

Our War Relief Work

OUR readers generally, and especially those who have contributed to the Fund for the Widows and Orphans of the European War, will be glad to know that remittances have been sent to Christian Herald Relief Committees in London, Paris, Berlin and Vienna. It is hoped that arrangements now under way will soon result in opening relief work in Russian Poland and possibly in Serbia. The activities of the Christian Herald Fund up to the present time are shown below:

Christian Herald Belgian Relief Committee. Cargo of 600 tons of food distributed under U. S. Minister Whitlock's direction in Brussels, Antwerp, Louvain, Malines and other cities	$40,000
Christian Herald Holland Relief Committee, P. C. Jongeneel, chairman (for Belgian refugees)	10,000
Christian Herald London Relief Committee, Rev. A. C. Dixon, chairman	10,000
Christian Herald Paris Relief Committee, Pastor Charles Wagner, chairman	10,000
Christian Herald Berlin Relief Committee, Pastor Siegmund Schultze, chairman	10,000
Christian Herald Vienna Relief Committee, Pastor Antonius Julius, chairman	10,000
Total remittances to date	$90,000

We rejoice with our readers and their friends in the success that is attending this great worldwide mission of mercy and helpfulness, in the carrying out of which they are giving such loyal encouragement and support.

Christians in Turkey

EVERYTHING is quiet at Beirut." This reassuring message arrived by cable to the Navy Department at Washington on December 29 from Captain Oman of the North Carolina, stationed now at Beirut Harbor. Considerable agitation had been caused a day or two previously by an unconfirmed report from Athens that the North Carolina had threatened to shell the town of Tripoli, Syria, because a mob there interfered with the embarkation of British and French refugees. Captain Oman's cablegram states that it was a Russian, not an American cruiser, that made such a threat. The American cruiser Tennessee recently transported five hundred refugees of different nationalities from Jaffa to Alexandria. During the anxious days missionaries continue to send messages, some alarming, some reassuring, to their friends in America.

One missionary writes: "Turkey's troops are already occupying Lebanon, where there is great danger of bloodshed from local causes." He adds: "We are all poor as church mice out here and do not know at the present moment when the situation can be changed. Our hearts are bleeding for the desperately poor whom we have no means of helping."

The attention of our readers is called to the remarkable paragraphs on the Sunday school page of this issue of the Christian Herald from Dr. Hoskins of Beirut. He writes:

I am not a prophet, nor the son of a prophet, nor have I any scheme of prophecy to propose; but when one recalls the position of Palestine at the junction of three continents, and Esdraelon, not far from the outlets of the Bosphorus, controlling the Danube and the rivers of Russia, the Nile and the Suez Canal, and watches the movements of armies and nations in this almost universal war, one might almost think that we were approaching Har Magedon. Never since the dawn of history has any such concourse been within striking distance of this ancient battlefield (Esdraelon)."

The admiration of American Christians goes out to our brave representatives in troubled Syria. America must remain firm in her determination not to become in any way involved in the conflict now raging. It is a relief to know that the rumor of a threat made by an American vessel upon a Syrian town was unfounded. We are the friends of all the contestants in this tragic, gigantic conflict, and continue to hope for an opportunity in aiding their return to the paths of peace. Meanwhile the American church must be much in prayer for the safety and welfare of her missionaries and for her fellow Christians among the natives of seething Syria.

London's Newspaper War

LONDON has lately been in the throes of a bitter journalistic war, which has fairly divided popular interest with the sea raider and the Zeppelins. It started in Fleet Street the newspaper section of the English metropolis with the appearance of a pamphlet said by the New York Herald correspondent to have been inspired by Lord Northcliffe, the owner of the Time and the Daily Mail, and which contained a sharp attack on a rival paper, the Daily News, edited by Alfred G. Gardiner. In that pamphlet the News was exposed as a false peace prophet, while the war predictions of the Mail were lauded as a great journalistic triumph, deserving of congratulation. The editor of the News promptly took up the challenge and retaliated by calling the Mail "a cultivator of war and hate"; it had preached war against the Boers, the French, the Russians and ever against the British Government itself, by fanning the flames of revolt in Ulster. The News editor asserted bluntly that Lord Northcliffe, in his publication, had preached war, not for patriotic motives but solely to sell the paper. He stirred up the passions of the British mob because he knew that war "was a good newspaper thriller." For twenty years he had been "the incendiary of journalism, ever ready to set the world in a blaze to make a newspaper placard"; and now he rejoiced in a victory that has made Europe a shambles and which has cost over a million lives.

At this stage of affairs (as we further learn from the Herald) the owner of the Mail called into the wrangle as his defender Mr. Robert Blatchford, a leading Socialist, who made the next contribution to the literature of the controversy. He accused the News of advocating British neutrality in the present war, quoting evidence of this fact from its own columns. But the News, which admitted the charge, shelved this new apologist as one with whom the public had no concern, and insisted that the case rested with Lord Northcliffe alone, who must settle at the bar of public opinion for his "exploitation of war as a commercial asset."

This unseemly wrangle shows that yellow journalism, as a by-product of modern civilization, has no geographical limitations, but finds congenial soil wherever there is a printing press, flourishes in any climate and inflicts itself on any community where it can find an audience of the thoughtless and credulous. Here as elsewhere, unfortunately, it has its audiences, and has shown its capacity for mischief on various memorable occasions.

A Life of Noble Service

THERE passed away in New York a few days ago a woman by whose life the whole world was the gainer. Born to wealth and surrounded by all the conditions that ordinarily conduce to ease and luxury, she might have become a shining light in society—a leader in those circles where wealth and an honored name win a ready welcome. But she esteemed the world's adulation lightly. In her youth there had been kindled in her heart a love of service, and it grew with the years until it became a glowing flame—an absorbing passion. Few who knew her divined that within her glowed the Crusader spirit. None save her intimate friends realized that Grace Hoadley Dodge, the quiet Christian woman who shrank at publicity, was doing large things unostentatiously, which would some day put her in the rank of the great benefactors of her day and generation. She realized the ideal of a woman with a high purpose in life. Her wealth she regarded as a trusteeship, for which she must render full account. Few women in America have done more to advance the cause of social and religious work. Under her hand many a worthy project seemed to receive blessing and inspiration. Wise and far-seeing, she "built better than she knew." She anticipated the coming development of the Young Women's Christian Association and her plans for its future were fully vindicated. Materially, intellectually and spiritually, she gave form and direction to various projects for the betterment of women. Her gifts, even when they reached up into the hundreds of thousands, were seldom heralded abroad, for she loved rather to give in secret, remembering the injunction "let not thy left hand know what thy right hand doeth." Such were the characteristics of the long and noble life of service which, now being ended, we must add to the honor roll of distinguished American womanhood.

Eminent Men Sell Newspapers

IN a number of cities a few days ago prominent men who had been newsboys early in life took their places on the street corners, where they had stood thirty or forty years ago, and sold papers for local charities. In Chicago "Old Newsboys' Day" was observed in this manner on December 3. Mayor Carter H. Harrison, who himself was once a newsboy; K. M. Landis, United States district judge; John E. Owens, former county judge; Thomas F. Scully, county judge, and William Forimer, formerly United States senator, are reported to have sold papers as they did of old. In Detroit the old newsboys of prominence, led by James G. Brady, collector of internal revenue, sold papers on the corners on December 21. In order that the regular boys should lose nothing, arrangements were made to purchase papers from them at the customary retail price. Among those thus selling the papers were two physicians, a judge, an alderman, a banker and a large number of merchants and manufacturers. A large majority of the most prominent and successful professional and business men in the country have been poor boys who began at the foot of the ladder and have climbed to the top by hard work. The sons of the rich that remain and add to inherited fortunes and make good use of them deserve especial credit, for money thus gotten is likely to be a handicap to a young man in the race of life, prompting the hands to indolence and the heart to luxury and the extravagance and moral danger that so often accompany it. These boys came to eminence not because they were newsboys, but because they were hustlers in selling papers and at everything else they undertook. The Bible makes this reference to energy as an element of earthly success: "The hand of the diligent maketh rich." "The hand of the diligent shall bear rule." (Prov. 10: 4; Prov. 12: 24.)

Senator Kern's Christmas Gift

IN THE recovery from infantile paralysis of his son and namesake, who has been afflicted for six years, United States Senator John W. Kern of Indiana rejoiced over a valued Christmas gift to his family. Six weeks ago a remarkable operation was performed on the boy, who is now fourteen years old. New tissues were grafted on the shrunken leg to replace those atrophied. Early in December the patient was brought from the hospital to Washington with his limb in a plaster cast. Two days before Christmas the cast was removed and the entire success of the operation was disclosed. Although some discomfort is still felt from the bandage, the happy young patient will be able to walk and play ball inside of another month. What a Christmas present this cure was to the boy himself, removing the physical and mental handicap he would have had in the race of life! What a blessing also to the parents, who suffered more, if possible, than the son in his disability! No one but a father or mother who has had an invalid child can realize what sympathetic suffering is and how great the rejoicing of Senator and Mrs. Kern must be at the restoration of their boy to health. The miracle of modern surgery is the result of the civilization of Christ. He, when on earth, made much of physical healing, in connection with his spiritual cures. He told John's disciples to say to their master that the evidences of his Messiahship were: "The blind receive their sight, and the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed, the dead are raised up, and the poor have the Gospel preached to them." (Matt. 11: 5.)

Students Sell Their Blood

IN ANSWER to an advertisement, a student of Columbia University sold eight ounces of his own blood to St. Luke's Hospital. He received $25 for it, and spent the money for Christmas presents.

Nine others followed his example. The parting with one's own blood for love is heroic, selling it as a commodity is another thing; it is a pure matter of business. Their blood may or may not save the lives for whose restoration it was intended. Christ shed his blood for us without money and without price, and all are saved who make an application of it. The remission of sins by the shedding of blood was the central thought of the Mosaic system and ritual, pointing to the spotless Lamb, whose blood was to take away the sins of the world. Christ thus mentions and perpetuates the thought of his atonement: "This is my blood of the new testament, which is shed for many for the remission of sins." (Matt. 26: 28.)

BLIND PEOPLE RECEIVE PENSIONS

NEW YORK CITY gives a small pension annually to all of its registered blind citizens. This is received with gratitude, and fills the hearts and homes of the unfortunate with cheer. This is a proper provision, and it might be hoped that the allowance were more generous than it is. Christ taught an altruism which is becoming more and more general. It is the business of those who have health to help take care of the sick, of those who are strong to support the weak, of those who are competent to provide for the imbecile, of those who have eyes to lead the blind, and of those who have spiritual character and life to lift up and save the fallen. Society everywhere is doing even better than granting pensions to the blind. It is providing institutions where the blind can not only secure an elementary, but a liberal education, even a technical preparation for trades and callings where the afflicted can make their own living. For there is no charity that can be compared with that of helping people to help themselves. Blind people can see much without eyes of clay. They can see with the mind a realm of material facts discovered by the scientist, of their relation to each other by the philosopher, of the beauty of form, of color, of melody behind them by the artist; of beauty of thought in them by the poet. They can see with the soul the Infinite Spirit underneath all the forms and forces of matter and mind, who is God. God pulled the curtains down over the windows of Homer's soul that he might see inner visions, which he has shown to the ages, and will to the end of time. Blinds were put up over Milton's eyes that he might see more clearly heaven and hell, and impart the saving vision to others. Shutters were put up over Fanny Crosby's eyes that she might the better see the Man on the tree, and the heaven he prepared. She sang "Just as I am, thy love unknown hath broken every barrier down." To this vision of God with the eye of conscience Christ referred when he said: "Blessed are the pure in heart: for they shall see God." (Matt. 5: 8.)

White Deer Brings $200

A WHITE deer was killed at the close of the hunting season at Ladysmith, Wis., the other day, and a man paid $200 for it. He intends to have it mounted and says he will get from $600 to $800 for it. The white deer is a freak and is exceedingly rare. One was shot in Wisconsin eight years ago and one twenty years ago. It is believed that only one more white deer exists in the Wisconsin woods. All deer are beautiful; how comely a white deer must be! Deer were among the animals of the Bible lands, and some of the most beautiful and touching passages of Scripture refer to the habits of this animal. This is one of them: "As the hart panteth after the water brooks, so panteth my soul after thee, O God." (Ps. 42: 1.)

Ostrich Feeds Fifteen Hundred

ROAST ostrich was the chief dish at a Young Men's Christian Association dinner given the other day in Los Angeles, Calif. There was but one bird, and fifteen hundred guests were served from it. The ostrich was five months old. Dressed for cooking, it weighed somewhat over a hundred pounds. Each drumstick tipped the scales at sixteen pounds. The ostrich is too expensive a bird for table use. From time immemorial it has been prized on account of its beautiful feathers, which today in so many nations are so popular and expensive a decoration for women. The beautiful white plumes grow in the ends of the wings of the male birds. A good bird three years of age will yield between thirty and forty of these plumes. The tail feathers are not so valuable, and those of the female are generally spotted and flecked with gray. The similarity between the climate of South Africa and Southern California is such that ostrich farming in California has gotten to be quite an industry. The Scriptures have this reference to the ostrich as a feather-producing creature: "Gavest thou the goodly wings unto the peacocks? or wings and feathers unto the ostrich?" (Job 39: 13.)

Visits Municipal Lodging House

COLONEL THEODORE ROOSEVELT visited the Municipal Lodging House of New York City the other evening, just as two hundred down-and-outs were being served with their meal of coffee, rolls, pea soup, etc. The colonel ate the meal and said it was good. He is investigating the question of the unemployed for data for lectures. The hunger of the body and its relief suggest that of the soul and its supply by Christ, who said: "He that cometh to me shall not hunger, and he that believeth in me shall never thirst." John 6: 35.

Fifty Years in White House

NO PRESIDENT of the United States is allowed to stay over eight years in the White House, but Colonel William H. Crook has been at the White House in some official capacity or another for fifty years. His half century of loyal service there was fittingly celebrated in Washington January 5, all making contributions to the success of the event, from President Wilson down to the humblest janitor. Colonel Crook's official title is "chief disbursing officer," but he is more widely known as the White House Encyclopedia. From Lincoln to Wilson he has had an intimate personal acquaintance with all the presidents, and he is sought constantly for individual and public facts about the various chief executives and their administrations. Colonel Crook was a member of President Lincoln's bodyguard and had been on duty for twenty-four hours continuously when Lincoln started for Ford's Theater, where he was shot. The colonel says he begged Lincoln to let him accompany him, but Lincoln, remembering that Crook had been on duty for a day and night, ordered him to go to bed and rest. In a delightful interview with him about Lincoln, whose inner life he knew so well, the colonel described to us in touching language Lincoln's pathetic devotion to his little son "Tad." The great man unbent nowhere as he did with his little pet. It about broke Lincoln's heart when Taddie died. Jolly as he always was, his wit was sobered down after that. Colonel Crook is a man of intelligence, culture and Christian consecration. The reception given was a fitting recognition of his half century of devoted service and voiced the words with which we trust the Master will receive him at last: "Well done, thou good and faithful servant." (Matt. 25: 21.)

YOUNG CHINA

BY FRANK L. BROWN, Joint General Secretary World's Sunday School Convention

fast to a companion for support; and then in a girls' school in the Southern Methodist Compound of Soochow I witnessed the splendid athletic exercises of the girls whose feet had not been bound. And when one of these girls, in beautiful English, made her speech of welcome to us as guests, she showed the quality of the mind of young China. Eagerly these Chinese girls listened to my story of an American Sunday school.

I stood at the door of the Y. M. C. A. at Shanghai with Consul General Wilder of Maine, whose splendid stand for temperance in that city, where social customs are loose, has done credit to his state and country. Several thousand of the bright-faced, keen-eyed boys and girls of the Sunday schools of China were swinging past us into the Martyrs' Hall, with their beautiful silk banners, and singing in Chinese, "Onward, Christian Soldiers." The consul general looked at them with glowing face, then turned to me and said, "Mr. Brown, give these Chinese boys and girls an education, and they will do as well as your children and mine."

And so they will. During the visit of our Sunday school party in China last year, in every city visited, in Shanghai, Soochow, Nanking, Hangchow, Peking, Tientsin, a series of Sunday school field days had been arranged, an absolutely new thing for the Sunday schools of China, with songs, sports, refreshments, addresses.

In Shanghai ten thousand came together in one great Sunday school gathering in Chang Su-ho's garden in a glad day of wholesome fun. There was egg hunting, of course, and athletic contests, including a tug-of-war, and day fireworks, during which various paper animals were shot up into the air, and, last of all, an open Bible of paper, which floated along, gazed at by thousands, as the book revealing China's new hope and the way to permanent progress.

The Shanghai Mercury, a daily paper, said of this gathering: "For here was young China at its best, freed from many of the fetters of old superstitions; emancipated in the case of the women from the effects of millenniums of enforced ignorance and seclusion; bright, cheery, intellectual; types of which any country might well be proud, and who, if China is to be reinvigorated at all, may be trusted to perform the task. . . . If it (the Sunday school) grows, and grows, and grows in China as we hope to see it do, the days of crying wrong, of universal corruption and of all gross evils are numbered."

There are one hundred million children in China under ten years of age. One wonders how there are so many remaining, for multitudes of children die off through exposure, ill care, starvation and disease. Hundreds of thousands of these children live in the Chinese sampans, which ply the rivers and throng the water fronts of the great cities. For generations these boatmen knew no other home than these boats. A rope is attached under the babies' arms, and if they slip into the water they are fished out.

But life is plenty and cheap in China. "How much then is a man better than a sheep?" Not much better in China. A friend of mine, a Brooklyn judge, who arrived late at the public execution in Canton, and who could only stay for the day, was told that for $10 they would secure a special victim to satisfy the American's curiosity. And they proceeded to find a man who for the sake of his family was willing to barter his life for $10. Of course he got the $10 and his life.

Such institutions as the splendid Christian Herald orphanage in Soochow, and this journal's Famine Relief Fund for China, have done much to give a new value to life, especially that of childhood.

Such expressions as these make America the most dominant influence in China today in its real reconstruction. America's Christian schools, the return of the Boxer Indemnity Fund to China for education, America's recognition of the Chinese republic, our non-participation in the unpopular five-power loan, our consistent attitude in seeking China's good and not its gold—these are the profound influences recognized by the practical Chinese. What is the result? Chinese youth of high type are coming in increasing numbers to America for education. Chinese leaders are being selected by the government from the American Christian universities at Nanking, Shanghai, Canton and Peking. At one banquet at Tientsin I counted seven American university graduates now leaders in that province.

The sharp difference between the old and the new finds special illustration at Nanking. The old plan of education still adhered to in many parts of China was to memorize the Confucian classics. This work was carried on in small groups in country and city under the guidance of Confucian teachers. The brightest of these scholars went at certain periods to examination centers where for days they were confined in three-by-four stalls, enclosed on three sides, while they wrote their essays as a basis for government preferment. The substitution of modern educational requirements for the old Confucian classics has utterly changed this system. At Nanking I saw thousands of these examination stalls arranged in long rows, acres of them, silent, deserted, the passageways overgrown with weeds. Hard by was an old Confucian temple, its courts a mass of weeds and attended by a solitary priest. A mile away was the Nanking Christian University, attended by hundreds of bright Chinese young men and young women, their faces set toward the new day, alert, athletic, eager to know the most and best. I stood on the platform with Mr. H. J. Heinz, chairman of the executive committee of the World's Sunday School Association, when he presented to these straight, long-gowned Chinese youth one hundred Sunday school teacher-training certificates as recognition of their preparation for Sunday school leadership in China.

On that same platform a contrast was shown of the "Sunday school of yesterday" in a disorderly, ungraded school and the "Sunday school of tomorrow," with small groups of boys, each group taught by a Chinese Christian student. And in China nearly 200,000 are now enrolled in the Sunday schools. Graded lessons have been produced, an officers' and teachers' library translated, and a summer training school established by Mr. E. G. Tewksbury, secretary of the China Sunday School Union. Last summer thirty-five Chinese young men were in training in that school for provincial Sunday school leadership. Think, too, of the Bible-memorizing possibilities of these Chinese boys and girls, trained to a high ability in the sheer memorization of the Confucian classics. At Canton I found seven girls who, I was informed, had repeated the entire New Testament from memory.

Then, too, there is the sharp contrast between the superstitions of yesterday that have enslaved the people, and young China's freedom from the fear and dread of spirits. In the city of Soochow I was at the top of a

THE WAR IN EUROPE

BY ANTHONY ARNOUX

European journalist of many years' standing; military critic; staff writer of the Paris Daily Mail and Le Temps; contributor to l'Indépendance Belge

THE two events of peculiar interest to Americans which have happened during the past week are the American note to Great Britain on the subject of delays and exactions to American commerce, and the German note to the United States on the subject of American consuls in Belgium.

The note of the United States Government to Great Britain was long, and contained a detailed statement of specific cases in addition to making a general protest covering the entire subject of the relations between the United States and Great Britain, as affected by the latter's policy toward neutral merchant ships, which is considered as highly objectionable by the government of the United States. The document points out that complaints are widespread and that public opinion in the United States holds the British policy as directly responsible for the depression in many American industries, a situation the seriousness of which must be apparent.

Reimbursement alone for cargoes unlawfully detained or seized, it states, does not remedy the evil, as the chief difficulty is the evil moral effect of the British practice upon American exporters, who are restrained thereby from taking risks and hazards which in no case ought to surround legitimate trade between the United States and other neutral countries.

A discussion of the specific acts complained of, particularly relating to Great Britain's having practically abolished the distinction between absolute contraband and conditional contraband, and having placed articles which have always heretofore by international law been regarded as not contraband, on the list of contraband, would be too long and too highly technical to be discussed here. But in the main it may be said that the United States is in entire agreement with the doctrines expressed heretofore by the British Government itself at the time of the Boer War and at the time of the Russo-Japanese War.

The German Government has notified the United States in a formal note that American consuls in Belgium must be acceptable to the German military authorities, and that it is desirable that some of the consuls be withdrawn for the present, at least. This demand for the withdrawal of certain consuls is stated to be entirely impersonal, and to be based upon the law of military necessity which recognizes the right of the commanding officer in occupied territory to dictate absolutely the amount and extent of civil business and the manner in which it shall be conducted in such territory. All South American Governments received identical notes.

It must also be remembered that consuls are not diplomatic officers, and have none of the rights, privileges, powers and immunities appertaining to diplomatic officers. A consul is merely a commercial officer whose right to perform any act in his consular district depends entirely on his exequatur, which the issuing government—that in which the consular district is located—may at any time revoke without notice.

Japan, which now is in the same position as regards Kiauchau as Germany is as regards Belgium, has also intimated its objection to the presence of foreign consuls in Kiauchau; and all neutral governments have conformed to her desires.

It has been frequently said in these columns that Russia would be unable to continue the war very much longer unless some way were found to replenish her stock of arms, ammunition and munitions of war generally. To her enormous loss of men, far greater than that of any other combatant, must be added an equally enormous loss in rifles and artillery of all sorts. Of the latter she is credibly said to have lost more than half of the equipment with which she began the war.

In herself Russia has no resources of moment wherewith to replace these losses, and hence she must be supplied from the outside. The sea routes to her ports on the Arctic are not feasible at this season of the year. The Baltic is equally impracticable owing to the dangers of navigation at its entrance and the presence of the German fleet in force therein. The route across Siberia is open, but to transport munitions of war from western Europe, or even from the United States, by this way to the front would require at least two and in all probability three months from the time of beginning the transport.

One other route exists, via the Mediterranean and the Black Sea. But Turkey controls the passage between those two seas. Hence, in order to relieve Russia's pressing necessities, the Allies have a strong fleet of warships accompanied by a large army on transports off the western entrance to the Dardanelles, and are preparing to attack Constantinople, both by land and sea, in an attempt to open the passage between the two seas. This is the most important move which has been made in the war in some time, and its being risked shows how great the Russian need is.

Outside of the above there is nothing which calls for comment in the several campaigns against Turkey. From Egypt we hear nothing; the rebellion in South Africa is over, but severe fighting continues in East Africa, though we hear nothing of the details.

It helps to make your dinner a success

There's no question of your soup-course being appropriate and delightfully acceptable when it is

Campbell's Tomato Soup

It is readily prepared either as a plain tomato bouillon—suitable with quite an elaborate dinner, or as a rich cream-of-tomato—to accompany a more moderate repast.

Its inviting character lends itself naturally to a wide variety of menus, while its distinctive and satisfying quality wins the approval of the most critical guest. Why not order a dozen today?

The British have given the return blow to the Germans for the German raid on the English east coast towns, by raiding during the past week Cuxhaven and Wilhelmshaven, at or near the estuary of the Elbe. This raid was effected with both naval and air forces, and was, in a psychological sense, successful, though how much material damage was done is problematic.

As a result of these two raids the coast towns of both England and Germany are in a state of excitement. It is, after all, unfair to call it nerves, because no one likes to be suddenly sent out of life without a possible chance of defense. As a result all the coast towns in both countries are clamoring for more efficient protection.

In the fighting between Austria and Serbia and Montenegro there is very little to be chronicled. After the retreat of the Austrians from the Serbian territory, an invasion of Bosnia and lower Hungary by the Servians would have seemed natural, but up to the present time nothing of this character has materialized.

The Franco-Belgian campaign is languishing. Taken from the west, the seacoast, to the east, the Swiss border, each day's reports are practically the same thing; progress from both sides, but when this progress is studied out on the map, it does not seem to appear.

Of course, it is quite impossible from this distance from the fighting, only viewing the topography on a scale of one mile to the inch, and not seeing either the disposition of the trenches or of the artillery, to appreciate the strategic importance of an advance of one mile and 54 yards, which is the greatest advance which has been made at any point between the English Channel and the Swiss frontier, along this battle line. This advance has been made, and made by the Allies, on the extreme western end of the line, from Nieupoort to St. George. It has been counterbalanced, but neither the advance nor the counterbalancing has any particular import.

The real truth—which is redundant for the truth can be nothing but real—is that on the western line of battle the deadlock is almost absolute, and looks as though it would so remain until the coming of spring, and with the spring the coming of the time when the temperature and the condition of the ground will be so that large bodies of men, artillery and trains can move some purpose.

What can human flesh and blood do even though possessing courage in the highest degree, when in one little week ten per cent. of the effective of a single regiment has to be sent home invalid from frost-bites and cold, as the London Times tells us was the case in the week of December 6-13? Slow suffering is far more difficult to endure than the excitement of the fight.

The campaign in the east is at the writing in a rather peculiar position. In East Prussia during the week the Germans have succeeded in complete driving out the Russians and forcing them back into their own territory. In northern Poland, the Germans have again advanced, recaptured Mlaw and are advancing southward thence from. In Central Poland, the center of the German attack, the German line has advanced very slowly during the week, and with continuous fighting. In southern Poland, the German advance has been more rapid, though in the face of a strenuous Russian resistance. In Galicia, the Austrians have been badly outmaneuvered and decisively beaten by the Russians and have lost heavily (30,000) in men and in equipment.

These positions are so interconnected that the Austrian reverses in Galicia will probably bring about the failure of the whole Polish-Galician campaign unless the German commander has the military genius of a Napoleon.

INDIAN SOLDIERS WEIGHING THEIR DAILY RATIONS

WORLD'S PEACE CAMPAIGN IS ON

THE WHOLE COUNTRY CLAMORS TO SIGN THE APPEAL TO PRESIDENT WILSON, FAVORING WORLD-WIDE FEDERATION

SOMETHING quite unexpected has happened. A month ago, when the warring hosts in Europe were at the maximum of their efforts at mutual destruction, any serious talk of world peace would have fallen on unheeding ears. Even here, with the ocean between us and the battlefields, the prospect of peace in the old world seemed very remote. Within the last few weeks a great change has taken place—a new hope has sprung up in the hearts of all the Christian people of this continent which bids fair to be communicated to the rest of the world.

When Dr. Frank Crane, through the columns of the Christian Herald, published his appeal to the President from the Christian Churches of America, in behalf of a movement for a federation of the world, he struck the keynote for which every one had then listened in vain. It was the electric spark which was needed to fire the magazine and set God's people everywhere working energetically with a very definite purpose in view. Dr. Crane in his eloquent protest urged Americans everywhere to sign the appeal with their own names and to secure the signatures of their friends and forward them to the President and to their respective congressmen. That the suggestion has taken root is evidenced by the fact that hundreds of requests for copies of the appeal are now pouring in upon the Christian Herald from all parts of the country.

Many of the letters that have been received, requesting copies

Why You Need the Christian Herald in 1915

HAS it dawned on you that the greatest year of history has begun? Has the thrill that is in everything today, reached you? The warning to be ready for great changes, has it struck on your soul? Do you wish to have a part in shaping events by helping to form opinion in your home and community? Are you determined to keep informed on all this year's developments? Have you resolved to live a happier, holier, more helpful life, whatever comes?

Then you need the Christian Herald. Studying long the prospect ahead, we have prepared to give our great world-wide Family Circle the most helpful and enjoyable and inspiring weekly magazine that has ever gone out from the Bible House.

The world is being shaken by the ear. The fearful situation in Europe has already started all nations and institutions, including the Church, to mending their ways. We believe the net result will be a much better world in which to live. And we intend to work for that result by making the Christian Herald an organ of hopefulness, progress in Christian civilization, and genuine cheer and helpfulness to the home and individual.

On an inside page we print a condensed program of our plans for 1915; look it over from top to bottom; do you need a magazine that will fill its pages with such things? You assuredly do. And we need your cooperation in order that we may produce a magazine that shall stand unflinchingly for Christian faith, for real peace on earth and good will among men. We need your cooperation in order that we may continue, as in the years past, to spread Christian optimism throughout the world both by words and deeds. And that is one of the strongest reasons why you need the Christian Herald in 1915—it needs you.

ALL of us sometimes and some of us often need a new stimulus to faith, a refreshment of our spiritual strength. Something must come into our lives outside of routine experience to give us this. Often we grope blindly for a new personal revelation of Christ. It seems none too much to say of Dr. Clark's newest book on the Holy Land that it is sure to bring to every heart just such a triumphant renewal of belief in a personal Saviour who trod this earth, a reassurance of the reality of the Gospel story and of the men and women and little children who knew Jesus of Nazareth. It is not easy to say exactly why this book should have this effect. It may be its richness in historical sidelights, or its tender human feeling, or its word painting, making the scenes stand out on the page, or its clear comment, by the way, on Scriptural passages. Most likely it is all these combined. And yet the book is but a straightforward, clearly told, reverent, delightful narrative of a pilgrimage in the Master's footsteps by a disciple of today who knows how to use his eyes and his ears and, thanks be, his pen. Many excellent pictures and four full-page beautiful color-process photographs of present-day scenes in Palestine illuminate the text. And so, for the helpfulness and uplift and entertainment this book gives we recommend it.

We will send this book, postpaid, and The Christian Herald for one year for $2.00. Or, to old subscribers, the book FREE with their renewal and one NEW yearly subscription with $3.00

THIS is a book specifically for you, for you haven't a half, nor a quarter, nor a thousandth of the friends you are entitled to have. Friends? The folks who send you eggs because you send them pears? Folks who ask after the health of your family and forget to call when you are ill? Folks who borrow your lawn mower or your pie pans as if conferring a favor, and entrust their pets to your care for the summer? Are these your friends? Sir and Madam, you need to get hold of Margaret Sangster's book right away. She might have called it Friends o' Yours. Her friends miraculously appear whenever she puts foot out of doors. She finds them without looking, exactly as people born with the gift stoop down and pick four-leaf clovers without once lowering their eyes. Wouldn't you like to find friends everywhere you go, in that unconventional way? Glean the secret from Friends o' Mine. Read these hundred and more short stories, sketches, poems, and if you do not begin to feel scales falling from your eyes—read them again. You will get a bookful of entertainment at any rate, and if your heart is in the right place you will get the friendship habit in the bargain; a very cheery, satisfying, go-to-bed-for-a-good-night's-sleep sort of habit to form, let us tell you—and a good one to form while young.

We will send "Friends o' Mine" and The Christian Herald for one year for $1.85. Or, to old subscribers, FREE upon receipt of their renewal and one NEW yearly subscription with $3.00

ALMOST everybody likes to go visiting. The country people still keep up the custom among themselves, and city people plan "week-end" tours to friends in the country. Some people in these strenuous days feel that they are too busy to visit. But even they remember occasionally the thrills of delight with which they used to take Thanksgiving or Christmas or summer time journeys back home. Mrs. Sangster's book of stories, "My Garden of Hearts," gives you the sensations of not one but many charming journeys—journeys among friends, journeys among strangers, journeys for the most part to the country places, but now and then to the city. You feel the delightful atmosphere of home and the fragrance of simple love and hopes and joys and sorrows.

Mrs. Sangster still has a message for the world which learned to love her so deeply before she went away. Her characters live on and bring their message of cheer and hope to young and old alike. Refreshment, delight and inspiration linger for every reader in the pages of "My Garden of Hearts."

The author ventures into the spirit world in her charming story, "When Dorothy Went Home." The glimpse of heaven revealed in this narrative seems almost as real and convincing as the glimpse of the home which had been stricken.

Nor was Mrs. Sangster afraid to tell about some of the unpleasant characters met with in some households. The niggardly, self-centered father and husband are depicted in "The Revolution of Molly" and "Elbert Ansel's Thanksgiving." The stories of their conquest by a bit of fearless independence on the part of daughters and wife make most satisfactory reading.

The book contains sixty-three separate stories and a group of Mrs. Sangster's incomparable "Familiar Talks."

We will send "My Garden of Hearts," postpaid, and The Christian Herald for one year for $1.75. Or, to old subscribers, a copy of the book FREE for their renewal and one NEW yearly subscription with $3.00

CAN you ask a new, sensible question about something in the Bible? Try it. When you are satisfied that you have done so, think upon this fact: For a score of years expert Bible scholars have been answering thousands of questions upon the Bible in the Christian Herald Mail-Bag. Now do you really believe a new question is possible? But every one of us is sure to ask again the same questions that others have asked, and they are new questions to us and the answers will be new. And after all, there are not such a swarm of questions; five hundred and fifty-five is the number we were able to select out of those that have been answered during the years, as being universal in their interest. And we are publishing this book in the belief that it will be a friend in need time and time again to every seeker after divine truth who has it in hand for reference.

When and why was the Sabbath changed to the first day of the week? Can evil emanate from God? Is confession a Christian belief? Should a Christian marry a non-Christian? Why does not God save all the human race? Will the Jews ever return to Palestine? What is the Parable of the Laborers intended to teach? Does a person go directly to heaven or hell after death? Have automobiles and airships been the subject of Biblical prophecy? Is a falsehood ever justifiable? Will there be a millennium and what will it be like? Have angels wings?

Just samples of the 555 questions answered in this book. Get the book; ask your question; consult the index; there's the answer. You have gotten along so far without this book, we will admit; but we fail to understand why you should struggle on without it any longer.

We will send this book, postpaid, and The Christian Herald for one year for only $1.85. Or, to old subscribers, a copy of the book FREE upon receipt of their renewal and one NEW yearly subscription with $3.00

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD wishes to thank all the members of its Family Circle for their loyalty and cooperation in the year that has closed. A national magazine founded on Christian principles and devoted to the interests of the home is a necessity in American life. You have enabled us to maintain such a publication with all that that makes possible of Christian influence and Christian principles, for many years. The need to uphold the standard of Christ in the periodical world has never been greater than it will be in the present year. In order that we may lift that banner high and advance it far, we ask you, friends and members of the Christian Herald Family, to stand by now as never before. More, we ask you to make a genuine, self-sacrificing, loyal effort to increase the list of our subscribers. Do you believe in the Christian Herald? Do you believe it is a power for good in the world? Then, friend, constitute yourself a missionary in the cause of Christian literature for the Home, and see to it that you make at least one convert to that cause. Will you do this,—you,—for the Christian Herald?—When?

DOMENICO MASTROIANNI had a vision. Domenico was born a carpenter's son, and at twelve years of age set out for Rome to become an artist. Through poverty and toil he was brought by his Maker to his place in the scheme of things: he became a modeler in clay, a sculptor of exceptional brilliance. Then he had his vision. He went to Palestine to realize it. His vision was this: to combine the best qualities of both painting and sculpture in a new representation of the scenes of the life of Christ. He would make his figures in the round so that they would have true perspective; he would give them the real physical characteristics of the Orient; he would make them tense with action, and would group them before the correct setting of street, or field, or stream, and surround them with the very atmosphere of their day.

Christ from Bethlehem to Golgotha are a delight to art lovers, a joy to all who reverence every incident in that Divine career.

There are eighty of these indescribable groups. They have been photographed and the photographs reproduced with exactness. These photographs have been gathered into one volume, printed upon heavy, coated, tinted paper, which greatly enhances their beauty. The portions of the Scriptures from which the subjects for these eighty great pictures have been drawn hold the series together in one connected story of the life of Christ, each work of art having its own chapter, the print being large and clear. The pages are embellished with ornaments and a beautiful tint design. This is by far one of the most desirable volumes the Christian Herald has ever been able to offer its readers and is a work that cannot fail to be a constant source of spiritual exaltation.

We will send this superb book, bound in decorated white cloth, postpaid, with The Christian Herald for one year for $3.00. Or we will send a copy of the book FREE to old subscribers upon receipt of their renewal and two NEW yearly subscriptions with $4.50

The Red Letter Edition Bible and New Testament

IN THE Red Letter Bible, more clearly than in any other edition of the Holy Scriptures, it becomes plain that, from beginning to end, the central Figure upon which all lines of law, history, poetry and prophecy converge is Jesus Christ, the Saviour of the world. He expounded in all the Scriptures the things concerning himself and the divine plan for man's redemption, and the Red Letter Bible indicates and emphasizes this divine exposition and personal revelation at each successive stage, making them so clear that even the simplest may understand. It sheds a new radiance upon the sacred pages by which the reader is enabled to trace unerringly the scarlet thread of prophecy from Genesis straight through to the person of the Divine Messiah, as the fulfilment of the promise of all the ages. The Red Letter Edition also brings out in a compelling manner the frequency with which Christ confirmed the authenticity of the Old Testament, greatly facilitating comparison and verification by the student. But only by constant use can one appreciate the many advantages to be derived from this method of printing the sacred text. By disregarding all but the red letter text in the New Testament (the utterances of Christ) one may enjoy a peculiar spiritual pleasure in intimate association with the Master undisturbed by the words of others. The whole tendency of the Red Letter edition is to make the Bible a more real and living Word of God.

In the Red Letter Edition Old Testament all passages quoted or referred to by Christ are printed in red, and a red star indicates the verses which embody prophetic references to the Messiah. In the New Testament all the words of Christ are printed in red. The Bible contains 268 pages of Helps and Concordance and 17 excellent Maps. Both Bible and New Testament are handsomely and serviceably bound in American Levant with overlapping edges. The type is bold-face minion. We will send the Bible and The Christian Herald for one year for $3.00. Or, to old subscribers, we will send the Bible FREE for sending us two NEW yearly subscriptions at $1.50 each. OR, add one dollar to the first offer, or one subscription to the second, to secure the Bible in genuine morocco, calf finish, leather lining, silk sewed. We will send the Red Letter Testament in either the Authorized or the Revised Version as desired, with The Christian Herald for one year, for only $2.00. Or, to old subscribers, we will send the Testament FREE as a reward for sending us one NEW yearly subscription with $1.50. All charges prepaid in every instance.

Two Perennial Delights

WE HAVE been publishing an Almanac for a number of years, and the only objection that has been raised, if we remember rightly, is that each edition is limited. But that objection must stand. We can in the nature of things get out only a certain number of this annual. And the way to be sure of having a copy is to apply promptly. The Almanac for the new year is every bit as good as the best that has preceded it: modestly forbids our saying more. But we believe you will find it a mine of entertainment and information more than worth the price over and over again. This is a book we get out with an ambition to give our readers something that will make us more popular with them every day of the year. And we pin our faith to this little volume that is packed full of good things, not omitting a careful chronology of the war up to November 1, nor the usual comprehensive summary of the status of the different denominations. But why go into the matter of contents? This is the same class of almanac as those which have brought us streams of grateful letters in the past. And the edition is not everlasting.

The 1915 Almanac will be sent, postpaid, if ten cents is added to your subscription for The Christian Herald for one year, new or renewal

WE HAVE been greatly delighted with the popularity of our Family Altar Calendar. There is great satisfaction in providing something that a great many people wish to have. The Calendar this year is on the same general plan as before, fully as beautiful, and contains a most excellent selection of Bible readings, memory texts, sermonettes and prayers for all the days of the year. It is by no means too late to hang this handsome and inspiring Calendar in your home ready for use in the daily worship. Let us suggest in this connection the wisdom of keeping up the daily worship in the home, or if you have neglected it, of renewing it in this year of trial, and of opportunity, too, that is dawning for the Church of Christ. It behooves us one and all to be prepared to stand fast for the faith once delivered to the saints; how better can we make this preparation than in a season of daily worship with our families? The Christian Herald Family Altar Calendar has been found by many to be excellently adapted to this purpose.

We will send the Calendar, postpaid, and The Christian Herald for one year for $1.90. Or, to old subscribers, the Calendar FREE for sending in their own renewal and one NEW yearly subscription with $3.00

The Christian Herald in 1915

ON THE exact reverse of this is printed a list of the regular departments of the Christian Herald. You are invited to help us decide which of these can best be retained another year by indicating on that coupon your preferences. In order to vote, please use this coupon even though you may not need the order blank. It may be detached and pasted on a postal card if not used in conjunction with the order blank. Under no circumstances send in your vote as a part of a letter on some other subject.

IT IS the aim of the Christian Herald in 1915 to give its readers the best of sermons, spiritual uplift, much help in the Sunday School and Young People's Societies, enlightening information on current topics and important events, a wide variety of excellent fiction, poetry and general subjects. To do this we shall keep up our famous Sermonic Department, the page of Daily Meditations for each day in the year, Editorial, Bible and Newspaper, Week in the World's News, and Sunday School pages, the Young People's Topics Department, Our Mail-Bag, the Prayer League and the "Do You Know Your Bible?" contest.

Special articles by experts will deal with the great Welfare Movements of the day, the Federal Reserve Banking System will be described, also the growing Zionist Movement, the opening of the Panama Canal and the great things of the Panama-Pacific Exposition. Miss Margaret E. Sangster will continue her delightful department.

An up-to-date Report of the War will appear each week; writers will discuss the war's effects upon America and the world; there will be a symposium upon World Peace and "America's Next Ten Years," Socialism, and other vital matters. Some unusual things the government is doing for the people as a whole will be described, the work of excavators in Bible lands reported, and a startling exposé of prison life by an ex-convict will appear. Attention will be given to the Roman Catholic propaganda for political power, an article will present the evidences of the genuineness of the Gospels and Epistles; the maiden pulpit efforts of some of our famous preachers will be told.

Besides the great serial story, "The Return of Pollyanna," there will be a liberal amount of the best fiction, much good poetry, a remarkable imaginary story of an aerial war for the possession of Judea, special contributions by Dr. Frank Crane, Charles Grant Miller, Dr. O. S. Marden and other equally popular writers, and ample pictorial features of the best kind in addition to the fifty-two art covers. News of the different denominations, reports from the scenes of our War Relief work in Europe, a prize competition in sacred music, and important articles upon agricultural subjects are also in the program, which is by no means complete in the above summary.

THE RETURN OF POLLYANNA

BY ELEANOR H. PORTER

Copyright, 1914, by ELEANOR H. PORTER. All rights reserved, including the right to translate into all foreign languages

[SYNOPSIS OF WHAT HAS TAKEN PLACE: Mrs. Carew, a rich Boston woman, lives almost as a recluse in sorrow over the disappearance, years ago, of a little nephew Jamie. Her sister, Miss Wetherby, was Pollyanna's nurse during her stay at the Sanatorium where she was so wonderfully brought back to health and strength by Dr. Ames after her accident. Miss Wetherby persuades Mrs. Carew to invite Pollyanna to spend the winter with her, feeling sure that the result will be her restoration to happiness. Letters from Miss Wetherby and Dr. Ames persuade Dr. and Mrs. Chilton to let Pollyanna go, they themselves planning to spend the winter in Europe. Pollyanna is greatly delighted with Mrs. Carew's magnificent home on Commonwealth Avenue and with all that she sees of Boston. At the end of her first week she strays into the Public Garden, where by her conversation and her description of "the glad game" she starts an ex-convict toward a useful life and saves a young woman from temptation. Leaving the park, Pollyanna wanders in the wrong direction, loses her way, is rescued and brought home by a little newsboy. Some weeks later she meets her newsboy friend, Jerry, in the Public Garden. He has just wheeled up a little lame boy, his adopted brother, to spend the day in the park. Pollyanna learns that the boy's name is James; that his father is dead, and he cannot remember his name; that he loved books, some of which James still owns and reads. She is confident that he is the lost Jamie. The boy fails to come to the park for several weeks. Pollyanna is in despair, as she does not know how to find him. One day Jerry comes to Mrs. Carew's home to say that his foster brother is sick and wishes to see Pollyanna. Mrs. Carew is unwilling to let her go, but Pollyanna, in her insistence, finally acknowledges that she thinks the sick boy is Jamie. Mrs. Carew decides to go with Jerry at once.]

IN MURPHY'S ALLEY

WITH the opulent purr that seems to be peculiar to luxurious limousines, Mrs. Carew's car rolled down Commonwealth Avenue and out upon Arlington Street to Charles. Inside sat a shining-eyed little girl and a white-faced, tense woman. Outside, to give directions to the plainly disapproving chauffeur, sat Jerry Murphy, inordinately proud and insufferably important.

"When the limousine came to a stop before a shabby doorway in a narrow, dirty alley, the boy leaped to the ground, and with a ridiculous imitation of the liveried pomposities he had so often watched, threw open the door of the car and stood waiting for the ladies to alight.

Pollyanna sprang out at once, her eyes widening with amazement and distress as she looked about her. Behind her came Mrs. Carew, visibly shuddering as her gaze swept the filth, the sordidness and the ragged children that swarmed shrieking and chattering out of the dismal tenements and surrounded the car in a second.

Jerry waved his arms angrily.

"Here, you, beat it!" he yelled to the motley throng. "This ain't no free movies! Can that racket and get a move on ye. Lively, now! We gotta get by. Jamie's got comp'ny."

Mrs. Carew shuddered again and laid a trembling hand on Jerry's shoulder.

"Not—here!" she recoiled.

But the boy did not hear. With shoves and pushes from sturdy fists and elbows he was making a path for his charges; and before Mrs. Carew knew quite how it was done, she found herself with the boy and Pollyanna at the foot of a rickety flight of stairs in a dim, evil-smelling hallway.

Once more she put out a shaking hand.

"Wait," she commanded huskily. "Remember! don't either of you say a word about—about his being possibly the boy I'm looking for. I must see for myself first, and—question him."

"Of course!" agreed Pollyanna.

"Sure! I'm on," nodded the boy. "I gotta go right off anyhow, so I won't bother ye none. Now toddle easy up these 'ere stairs. There's always holes, and most generally there's a kid or two asleep somewheres. An' the elevator ain't runnin' terday," he gibed cheerfully. "We gotta go ter the top, too!"

Mrs. Carew found the "holes"—broken boards that creaked and bent fearsomely under her shrinking feet; and she found one "kid"—a two-year-old baby playing with an empty tin can on a string which he was banging up and down the second flight of stairs. On all sides doors were opened, now boldly, now stealthily, but always disclosing women with tousled heads or peering children with dirty faces. Somewhere a baby was wailing piteously. Somewhere else a man was cursing. Everywhere was the smell of bad whisky, stale cabbage and unwashed humanity.

At the top of the third and last

Mrs. Carew stepped into the room, and as if to steady herself, paused a minute with her back to the wall. Pollyanna hurried forward with a low cry just as Jerry, with an apologetic "I gotta go now; good-by!" dashed through the door.

"Oh, Jamie, I'm so glad I've found you," cried Pollyanna. "You don't know how I've looked and looked for you every day. But I'm so sorry you're sick!"

Jamie smiled radiantly and held out a thin, white hand.

"I ain't sorry—I'm glad," he emphasized meaningly; "cause it's brought you to see me. Besides, I'm

"I don't know."

"He is not your son?" For the first time Mrs. Carew turned to the twist little woman who was still standing by the bed.

"No, madam."

"And you don't know his name

"No, madam. I never knew it."

With a despairing gesture Mrs. Carew turned back to the boy.

"But think, think—don't you remember anything of your name but Jamie?"

The boy shook his head. Into his eyes was coming a puzzled wonder.

"No, nothing."

"Haven't you anything that belonged to your father, with possibly his name in it?"

"There wasn't anythin' worth saving but them books," interposed Mrs. Murphy. "Them's his. Maybe you'd like to look at 'em," she suggested, pointing to a row of worn volumes on a shelf across the room. Then, in plainly uncontrollable curiosity, she asked: "Was you thinkin' you knew him, ma'am?"

"I don't know," murmured Mrs. Carew, in a half-stifled voice, as she rose to her feet and crossed the room to the shelf of books.

There were not many—perhaps ten or a dozen. There was a volume of Shakespeare's plays, an Ivanhoe, a much-thumbed Lady of the Lake, a book of miscellaneous poems, a coverless Tennyson, a dilapidated Little Lord Fauntleroy, and two or three books of ancient and medieval history. But, though Mrs. Carew looked carefully through every one, she found nowhere any written word. With a despairing sigh she turned back to the boy and to the woman, both of whom now were watching her with startled questioning eyes.

"I wish you'd tell me—both of you—all you know about yourselves," she said brokenly, dropping herself once more into the chair by the bed.

And they told her. It was much the same story that Jamie had told Pollyanna in the Public Garden. There was little that was new, nothing that was significant, in spite of the probing questions that Mrs. Carew asked. At its conclusion Jamie turned eager eyes on Mrs. Carew's face.

"Do you think you knew—my father?" he begged.

Mrs. Carew closed her eyes and pressed her hand to her head.

"I don't—know," she answered. "But I think—not."

Pollyanna gave a quick cry of keen disappointment, but as quickly she suppressed it in obedience to Mrs. Carew's warning glance. With new horror, however, she surveyed the tiny room.

Jamie, turning his wondering eyes from Mrs. Carew's face, suddenly awoke to his duties as host.

"Wasn't you good to come!" he said to Pollyanna, gratefully. How's Sir Lancelot? Do you ever go to feed him now?" Then, as Pollyanna did not answer at once, he hurried on, his eyes going from her face to the somewhat battered pink in a broken-necked bottle in the window. "Did you see my posie? Jerry found it. Somebody dropped it and he picked it up. Ain't it pretty? And it smells a little."

But Pollyanna did not seem even to have heard him. She was still gazing, wide-eyed, about the room, clasping and unclasping her hands nervously.

"But I don't see how you can ever play the game here at all, Jamie," she faltered. "I didn't suppose there could be anywhere such a perfectly awful place to live in," she shuddered.

"Ho!" scoffed Jamie, valiantly. "You'd oughter see the Pikes downstairs. Theirs is a whole lot worse'n this. You don't know what a lot of nice things there is about this room. Why, we get the sun in that window there for 'most two hours every day, stairway the boy came to a pause before a closed door.

"I'm just a-thinkin' what Sir James'll say when he's wise ter the prize package I'm bringin' him," he whispered in a throaty voice. "I know what mumsey'll do—she'll turn on the weeps in no time ter see Jamie so tickled." The next moment he flung the door wide open. "Here we be—an' we come in a buzz-wagon!" he cried. "Ain't that goin' some, Sir James?"

It was a tiny room, cold and cheerless and pitifully bare, but scrupulously neat. There were here no tousled heads, no peering children, no odors of whisky, cabbage and unclean humanity. There were two beds, three broken chairs, a dry-goods-box table and a stove with a faint glow of light that told of a fire not nearly brisk enough to heat even that tiny room. On one of the beds lay a lad with flushed cheeks and fever-bright eyes. Near him sat a thin, white-faced woman, bent and twisted with rheumatism.

better now, anyway. Mumsey, this is the little girl, you know, that told me the glad game—and mumsey's playing it, too," he triumphed, turning back to Pollyanna. "First she cried 'cause her back hurts too bad to let her work; then when I was took worse she was glad she couldn't work, 'cause she could be here to take care of me, you know."

At that moment Mrs. Carew hurried forward, her eyes half-fearfully, half-longingly on the face of the lame boy in the bed.

"It's Mrs. Carew. I've brought her to see you, Jamie," introduced Pollyanna, in a tremulous voice.

The little twisted woman on the bed had struggled to her feet by this time and was nervously offering her a chair. Mrs. Carew accepted it without so much as a glance. Her eyes were still on the boy in the bed.

"Your name is—Jamie?" she asked, with visible difficulty.

"Yes, ma'am." The boy's bright eyes looked straight into hers.

"What is your other name?"

A WEEK in the WORLD'S NEWS

THE AMERICAS DRAWING TOGETHER. Following close upon the recent Pan-American Conference to consider what steps can be taken to establish an international neutral zone to be enforced upon the warring nations of Europe, comes announcement of an invitation sent out by President Wilson to all Central and South American nations to be represented by their ministers of finance and leading bankers at a conference in Washington with similar personages of this country, the object being a closer commercial relationship between all these great groups of nations. Only within comparatively recent months have direct financial connections of importance been made with any of these countries by American banking interests, and so far on a very small scale, financial transactions of moment being conducted heretofore through London, a condition that has operated against a rapid extension of trade between the United States and South and Central American peoples. The conference now proposed may greatly change all this: it is expected to open early in the spring.

CONVENTIONS FOR BRAIN AND BRAWN. The sixty-sixth annual convention of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, and the eighth of the American Association for Labor Legislation, were held in Philadelphia at the close of December. Their discussions in part touched kindred subjects, the scientists including among their topics the effect of improper ventilation upon mental work, a survey of our foreign trade and a study of the recent collapse of the world market. One speaker declared that the healthy brain-worker should look forward to forty years of usefulness after reaching the age of forty. Among strictly labor topics discussed by the representatives of labor that of workmen's compensation laws was foremost.

SANTA CLAUS AS AN EMPLOYMENT AGENT. A Chicago news despatch states that fully 4,000 men who had been laid off by big firms because of business depression were summoned to return to work immediately after Christmas. A decided business revival is predicted for the Middle West during the current month.

OHIO CATCHING THE COLORADO AILMENT. The coal miners' strike in Ohio, which was understood to have been settled, appears to be in force still, and several thousand families are said to have been served with eviction notices from the mine companies for failure to pay rent which has accrued during the continuance of the strike begun last April. It is intimated in the news reports that the strikers' quarters are to be required for strike-breakers. The United Mine Workers of America may seek to obtain injunctions restraining the mine owners from carrying out the eviction program. Federal troops on duty in Colorado since May are now being withdrawn according to a plan agreed to between the federal and state governments. It was not determined, however, just how soon the last troops will be withdrawn.

KING CANUTE TURNS OVER IN HIS GRAVE. A Mr. Philip Brasher of Trenton, N. J., Princeton man, is about to insist that the proud waves of the ocean shall come so far and no farther upon the beaches of New Jersey's famous summer resorts. The waves will come rolling in as before, laughing secretly at man's impotence as they come, all unaware that Mr. Brasher has been installing a compressed air outfit along the bottom which, at just the right moment, will release its charge from a series of perforated pipes, and presto, the mighty waves will be blown into dew drops. There may be practical objections to the plan, but it sounds very well worth trying if there is enough money left in the United States to do it.

FOR WAYS THAT ARE—WELL, INSCRUTABLE—THE HEATHEN CHINESE IS PECULIAR. The far-heralded Chinese republic stands in danger of being looked upon as a clever device for effecting a change of dynasties, the news of last week describing how President Yuan Shi Kai virtually re-established Confucianism as the state religion contrary to all expectations of our missionary bodies, and this week the news has it that by a new election law just promulgated the term of the president is fixed at ten years, the senate having the power, however, to extend the term indefinitely.

PUTTING THE AUTOS THROUGH THEIR PACES. While we may not all own automobiles or even ride in our strangely forgetful neighbor's, that is no reason why we should not take an interest in the advances being made in the designing and perfecting of these rewards of self-denial in other directions, and so the annual automobile shows now taking place in the big cities deserve mention. One hundred motor car manufacturers had taken floor space for the Grand Central Palace show, New York, and over two hundred makers of accessories: 150,000 square feet of space was required for the exhibits. About 400 different cars were entered, ranging in price from $295 to $6,000. The automobile industry ranks high in our commercial standing, and motor cars are more rapidly than ever taking their place among the necessities of today.

WHAT EVERY GIRL SHOULD KNOW. A Mississippi girl has cleared close to $100 from a tenth of an acre by planting tomato seed selected by herself, raising the plants, harvesting and canning the fruit and marketing the finished product, meeting socially with other girls, similarly engaged, at each other's homes to put up the tomatoes. Another member of the Girls' Canning Clubs of the South made $77.73 from 1,108 cans produced by her tenth of an acre. There are about 30,000 girls in this movement, scattered through 13 states: Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Maryland, Mississippi, North Carolina, Oklahoma, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, Virginia and West Virginia. The federal department of agriculture has supervision of this educational work which is carried on by the General Education Board, the object being to teach girls scientific ways of doing things and inculcate the spirit of co-operation and a sense of the social value of being capable.

WANTED: UNEMPLOYED MEN AND CAPITAL TO INSTALL MANUFACTORY IN ABANDONED BREWERY. Local option, taxes and increase of temperance have thrown a $12,000,000 brewery corporation of Ohio into the hands of a receiver, the order being handed down by the United States district court December 23. This is a big opportunity for Ohio to set an example in industrial advance by securing that huge plant for the making of one or more articles by men and women who need work and can't find it, but who, under competent management, might create a new business enterprise for their commonwealth, the state temporarily financing the undertaking.

SCARBOROUGH HOUSE WHERE TWO WERE KILLED

ENGLAND'S EAST COAST LOSES POPULARITY. The fatal attack upon unfortified English coast towns by German cruisers is said to have set the inhabitants of that section in alarm, many families leaving for the interior, and most men who reside there taking up rifle practice with a view to offering a stout defense against any attempt of the enemy to land. Complaints have been lodged with the admiralty against the patrol vessels which are said to have been unprepared to defend the coast though lying at Hartlepool, one of the bombarded towns. An eye-witness of the attack from a distance, who immediately afterward went all through Scarborough, has described in the New York Times the ruined condition of many of the buildings, and the terribly sober state of mind of the population that Sunday. All aliens, both those British-born and naturalized, have been ordered by the government to remove from coast towns to an area thirty miles inland and approved by the military authorities.

UNCLE SAMUEL GROWS PARSIMONIOUS. Internal Revenue Commissioner Osborne has announced that all voluntary gifts to ministers for officiating at marriages, baptisms, etc., must be included in the income tax, a ruling that may or may not swell the annual revenue.

PRESIDENT'S BIRTHDAY MESSAGE TO THE NATION. President Wilson was fifty-eight years old on December 28, and received many congratulatory telegrams, including one from King George of England and others from other eminent persons, and many callers were received by him. The President announced that all information reaching him indicate steadily improving business conditions throughout the United States.

A FRAGMENT OF CHRISTMAS TRUCE. The soldiers the various armies in the field tried to celebrate Christmas with some approach to its immemorial spirit of good fellowship. While fraternal feeling between the men in the opposing lines seems incongruous, it is nevertheless good to record. A London paper publishes a letter from an officer in the Queen's Westminster Rifles in which the English soldier tells how, though the official armistice was not arranged, the men in the ranks managed to have a Christmas truce of their own. On Christmas Eve they carried quantities of wood to the firing line from dawn until one o'clock Christmas morning. "All the time there was singing, cheering and trumpet calls in both lines, and the Germans had lights all along their front. We walked with our weapons in the bright moonlight, but not a shot was fired." The next day these weary but good-spirited soldiers left their respective trenches and met each other, British with Germans, between the lines. The officer himself was photographed in a group of soldiers of both armies. They exchanged souvenirs, conversed with friends, and exchanged addresses. The officer says: "It was the strangest scene you could imagine—going out unarmed to meet our enemies, also unarmed. After our talk I realize that a lot of our newspaper reports must be horribly exaggerated. Of course these men were Saxons—not Prussians."

EVERY-MAN-IN-CHURCH MOVEMENT. Following up suggestion made at the International Sunday School Convention in Chicago last spring, representatives of many brotherhood and other men's religious organizations who recently met in Buffalo planned a sweeping campaign to induce all the men in the churches to enter into definite active Christian work this winter, attendance upon Bible classes being one aim. A wide representative committee was formed to give body and direction to the movement, which has been described as the greatest forward movement yet attempted by American churches.

FINAL SESSION OF CONGRESS. Congress reconvened after its Christmas recess on December 29, to settle down to what promises to be a strenuous session. Various appropriation bills, the ship purchase bill, the Philippines bill, immigration bill and other matters of the first importance held over from the first half of the session make an unusually full program. It is understood that the President supports the Jones bill for ultimate Philippine independence and will not be deflected by the recent disturbances in the islands. The illiteracy test in the immigration bill is proving a serious hindrance to the passage of that measure.

GOVERNOR WITH PARDONITIS. All the facts are not before us to explain his course, but for what it is worth we restate the news from South Carolina in the papers of December 31 to the effect that Governor Blease has just pardoned, paroled and commuted the terms of fifty-five prisoners, three of whom were convicted dynamiters, making a total of 1,544 prisoners, including twenty-eight murderers, pardoned by the governor, and the news report intimates that in the twenty days of office still left to him, the 149 prisoners left in the state jails may hope for similar leniency.

WE WONDER IF THE FARMERS KNOW IT. The products of American farms in 1914 were worth ten billion dollars, according to Secretary Houston of the Department of Agriculture. This total includes crops and livestock and aggregates eighty-three million dollars more than in 1913, surpassing all previous records. The corn and the wheat were record crops, but cotton suffered an estimated loss of three hundred million dollars, without, however, preventing 1914 being the banner year. Of course these estimates do not represent an actual turnover of the products for cash, but merely their market value, the principle figures being as follows: Corn, $1,702,599,000; wheat, $878,680,000; hay, $779,068,000; cotton, $519,616,000; oats, $499,431,000; potatoes, $198,609,000; barley, $105,903,000; sweet potatoes, $41,294,000; rye, $37,018,000; sugar beets, $27,950,000; rice, $21,849,000; flaxseed, $19,540,000; buckwheat, $12,892,000.

THE PRINCIPLES OF ST. JAMES AT WORK IN CHRISTMAS CHARITY. In connection with the distribution of baskets of food by charitable institutions in New York on Christmas Day, the New York Bible Society distributed 16,993 Bibles, Testaments and Gospels, which were placed in the baskets, the result of a similar distribution of 10,000 last year encouraging the society to keep up the custom, as it is known that in many cases the Bibles have been read throughout the year. The Bowers Mission was included in the institutions through which this excellent work was done.

JAPAN DIVIDED ON MILITARY EXPANSION. Because the imperial diet rejected the government's program for military development, the Japanese emperor dissolved the national legislative body on December 25 in the midst of great excitement. The debates were prolonged and terminated in dramatic scenes when Emperor Yoshihito announced his action. The Japanese premier, Count Okuma, denied that the large increase asked for the army and navy meant militarism for Japan.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETINGS

NOTES ON THE CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR, EPWORTH LEAGUE AND BAPTIST YOUNG PEOPLE'S UNION TOPICS

Moses—From Passion to Self-Mastery

Epworth League Topic for January 24. Ex. 2: 11, 12; Num. 12: 1-3, 10-13; 16: 2-5.

WE ARE making startling discoveries as to the similarity of the conditions which Moses met in his work of delivering Israel and those which confront the great laboring masses of today. The Hebrews were the industrial slaves of the Egyptians. The Egyptians believed that the gods wished temples of quarried stone and also that the erection of tombs was more necessary than the building of homes. So the swarming masses of Egyptian workers, to which had been added the alien race of Israel, became laborers in the quarries and in the brickyards all where the temples and tombs were being built.

Kelly and Rumsey Jenness in their notes on the League topic for this date write: "Near the great construction works of Egypt have been uncovered the ruins of the tenements of the workers, from which it is seen that the close crowding of the people produced the difficult tenement house conditions which we find in our modern cities. There was no sewerage, no water supply and no lighting system for the Egyptian tenements." Speaking of the brick-making, they write: The brothers and cousins, perhaps even the father, of Moses must tread round and round, mixing the mud and water with bare feet. Under the blazing sun they then molded the mud in rough frames, laying out the bricks in the drying yard. Finally, the dried bricks were hauled in great loads on rollers, as we move a house, men heaved to the load, and straining to tear it up the inclined planes that were used for the erection of the fortresses, the treasure and grain storehouses on which the Hebrews worked. Some of the old brick walls undoubtedly made by the Hebrews have been uncovered, and the change from strawless bricks can still be seen. Moses probably looked upon his brethren as, under the lash of the overseer, they strained up the inclined plane.

Moses determined early in his life to give his people free from their taskmasters, but before he was able to be their leader he had to learn to master himself. Already he had developed strength of character, for though he had been brought up as the son of Pharaoh's daughter in the luxuries of the Egyptian court, he "chose rather to suffer affliction with the people of God than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season." Yet on one occasion he witnessed a case of special oppression on the part of some Egyptian master his wrath overcame him, and in defending his fellow countryman, he killed his oppressor.

For forty years after that Moses led in the wilderness, tending sheep and learning in the solitudes of God's own country the secrets of patience, kindness, self-control, and many lessons of truth.

How perfectly Moses did learn to control himself and to think of others instead of himself may be seen from that dramatic moment in his life when he asked Jehovah to blot out, if necessary, his name out of the book of life in order that his brethren might be saved. (Ex. 32: 32.)

There are various factors and elements in achieving perfect self-control. While it is never necessary to become weak or feeble in attacking injustices and wrongs, yet self must more and more be forgotten and the patience and power of God sought. So far as impatience is sinful it can be healed by the magic power, for Christ has promised to give us his patience for our own impatience.

Self-control grows more settled and complete as the years pass. We learn the folly of giving way to temper; we may come to care so earnestly for others that we shall shrink from wounding the feelings of any one, and our care for others, our thought of Christ and our trust in him, will help us to restrain our impulses to harshness and give us the true majesty and power of self-control.

There are tasks before us today even graver than those that confronted Moses. The forces standing for fairness and charity have need of leaders who, like Moses, learn the patience and power of "the God of the open air," and gain skill and strength to lead the people in his way.

Favorite Characters of the Bible, and Why

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topic for January 24. Ps. 105: 1-45 (Led by the Sunday School Superintendent.)

THIS ought to be an intensely interesting meeting. Its subject should be announced a week in advance, and each member asked to bring a list of his favorite Scripture characters, and also to state who is his first choice. The character of Jesus himself can hardly be included in this study because he is so incomparable that his name seems out of place in any list of other names.

The young men, many of them, will choose Daniel as their favorite character. Some will be inclined to include Joseph in their lists, but as the study of civilization advances the character of Joseph grows rather less than greater in the list of the world's leaders. In some respects he was led and helped by Jehovah, but he seemed later to develop a plan of rulership which it is difficult to think of God as commending. The character of Moses grows more splendid the more it is studied and the more civilization advances. Notice the paragraphs about Moses in the lesson study on the Epworth League topic of this date. Gideon is a fascinating character, so is Joshua; Jonathan ranks close to Daniel himself in the real charm of the best sort of young manhood. David has many fascinating characteristics, but as we read his life now it seems too grievously stained with blood and there is always staring us in the face the memory of his hideous sin. Josiah and Hezekiah were kings worthy of admiration. Samuel, Elijah, Elisha, and Isaiah are prophets of the sort we should like to see in the world today, with, it is true, less sternness than the first three sometimes showed.

Ruth and Esther stand out as the favorite women of the Old Testament. Their stories are ever full of delight, and the fact that so many girls of today bear their names shows how much they are still loved.

Of the New Testament characters we are apt to think of Peter as the most likable, and John the most admirable. Stephen compels our pity and praise. Paul almost frightens us with his intense courage, but we long to share his clear vision of the risen Christ and feel, as he felt, the fires of desire to win others to the rich joys of Christ's salvation. Mark and Timothy are lovable young men, Timothy appearing always to stand firm, Mark at one time wavering, though he may have had justifying causes for the change of plan which so displeased Paul, who later, however, came to love and honor this gifted ally. Have parts of the eleventh chapter of Hebrews read during the meeting and make it clear that the road to high character and fruitful service still lies open to all. It is the road of faith linked with uncompromising deeds of devotion to Jehovah and service to mankind.

This Car Leaves Nothing To Be Desired

The more deeply a car is rooted in the good opinion of its owners, the less the stress of rivalry.

You must be conscious that this is stillingly true of the Hupmobile.

Competition between other cars swirls all around and about it.

But the great central zone of Hupmobile ownership remains practically untouched—and entirely unperturbed.

The Hupmobile cannot be jarred loose from his allegiance.

A Hupmobile is something more to him than merely a motor car.

It is a form of service-rendered.

It is a continuous voucher of value-received.

He would no more think of discarding it than he would think of discharging an invaluable employee whom he could not replace.

He would as soon substitute an untried investment for one tried and proven.

This is the true explanation of Hupmobile sales solidity all over America, and all over the world.

GIDEON AND HIS THREE HUNDREI

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR JANUARY 24. (JUDGES 7)

The Field of Armageddon

By Rev. Franklin E. Hoskins, D.D.
Member of Syria Mission

GIDEON and his three hundred come much nearer to modern history than most people realize. The "Spring of Herod," most probably the fountain close by the town of Zerin (Jezreel) lies on the famous battlefield of Esdraelon, where thousands of famous warriors have quenched their thirst through the centuries since Gideon and his band lapped the water from their hands while scanning the neighborhood for signs of the enemy.

In connection with the lesson for January 10 mention was made of the possibility of war between Turkey and the Allies and, in case of such, the certainty of nations from the East and West meeting again in Syria on this most ancient battlefield, Esdraelon, now called Merj Ibn Amir. Since then war has actually broken out, and Esdraelon, where Gideon fought, requires more than a passing notice.

The valley of Jezreel is only another Bible name for Esdraelon, the triangular plain stretching westward from Mount Gilboa to Carmel or from the Mediterranean Sea to the Jordan valley. Its bays and natural gateways and ancient fortresses have been referred to in a preceding lesson. It is the world's most famous battlefield and becomes the type for the great world struggle between the powers of good and evil mentioned in Revelation 16: 16. The name Har Magedon is derived or connected with one of the fortress, Megiddo, situated at the pass leading from the south whence came enemies from Philistia and Egypt.

I am not a prophet, nor the son of a prophet, nor have I any scheme of prophecy to propose; but when one recalls the position of Palestine at the junction of three continents, and Esdraelon, not far from the outlets of the Bosphorus, controlling the Danube and the rivers of Russia, the Nile and the Suez Canal, and watches the movements of armies and nations in this almost universal war, one might almost think that we were approaching Har Magedon. Already German, Austrian and Ottoman soldiers are on the plain, or crossing this plain of Esdraelon. Russians are pouring down through Asia Minor toward the eastern Mediterranean; British and French soldiers are approaching Palestine. The Suez Canal is lined with British troops, Egyptian and a dozen nationalities from India and the Ganges, while behind them, not so far away, are the Japanese. If the United States should be drawn into the strife—which God forbid—then the Panama Canal and the Straits of Gibraltar

By Rev. F. B. Meyer, D.D.

"Not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith Jehovah of Hosts."—Zech. 4: 3.
There are three levels of force. First, the physical. Hercules, Samson, Napoleon Bonaparte, Archimedes with his lever, Nasmyth with his hammer, Stephenson with his locomotive, Lesseps with his canal, Edison with his electricity, Marconi with his wireless. Second, the psychical, which belongs to the soul. Here we class the great thinkers, artists, statesmen, rulers and leaders of every age. The seeperted spirits of our race! But, third, and beyond all, is the spiritual realm, where those eternal forces reside which we associate with God. It should be our aim to articulate our little lives with these. They are resident in the person of our Lord, to whom all authority is given in heaven and on earth, and therefore are easily available by us who are one with him. The civilized man is able to effect what appears miraculous to the savage, because he avails himself of the forces of nature, and makes them perform his bidding. Thus the Christian can accomplish still greater works, because he lives in union with the Holy Spirit—the Divine Medium between the divine and human—who gives himself to co-operate with the surrendered and obedient spirit of man.

would prove the pathway for the most remote nations of the East and West to come directly to the Levant, where lies Esdraelon, the prophetic type of Har Magedon. Never since the dawn of history has any such concourse been within striking distance of this ancient battlefield where Gideon fought so long ago.

The Battle Is Not Yours, But God's

By Rev. Edwin Whittier Caswell

AFTER Gideon was fully assured of his divine call to become the deliverer of his people he assembled thirty-two thousand soldiers for the battle, but God wanted less men rather than more, lest Israel would say, "Mine own hand hath saved me." After the twenty-two thousand fearful pessimists had fled God said, "There are yet too many; bring them down to the water and by every one that lappeth the water I will save you." So nine thousand seven hundred more returned home, leaving Gideon with his three hundred optimists, like the Spartan heroes of Thermopylae. The three hundred drank with their hands and tongues while on the run, as a railroad engine takes water without stopping. They watched and prayed and drank at the same moment. They were alert, vigilant, minute men, loving God and their nation more than their own lives. These Gideon Ironsides were ready for any emergency; feeling God within they were quick for the enemy without. The three hundred had a leader like themselves.

When Alexander's army was parched with thirst, he refused to drink the water handed him if his soldiers could not, for he said, "If I drink alone these men here will faint." His men forgot that they were weary or thirsty after that, as they rushed to the conflict. Some churches of a thousand members have only about one hundred who bear the burdens and win the victories.

Christians today have the water test, on rainy Sundays and rainy election days. It is then that the thousands dwindle to hundreds. Bad weather is worse than skepticism for the church. Rubbers, umbrellas and waterproofs are the implements of our warfare against the storms, instead of lamps, pitchers and trumpets. We must break our pitchers—voices—so our light will shine in testimony, then give the trumpet shout of victory.

Heaven will win this world by the few wholly consecrated men who will not compromise or condone with evil, who trust God rather than wealth and human power.

The thirty-one thousand seven hundred were men who could do little jobs at home, build over against their own house, send supplies to the army. They were useful ciphers when placed alongside a unit. Removing two of the ciphers from the thirty-two thousand we have three, hundred and twenty to win the victory.

The Midianites descended from Midian, the fourth son of Abraham by Keturah. For seven years they had devastated Palestine with their multitude of soldiers and camels. They depended upon numbers and military equipment. What if that vast horde had known that only three hundred soldiers with pitchers, lamps and trumpets were coming against them? They would have smiled in derision as Goliath did at David. The natural man has no true estimate of the power of God. All Gideon had to do was to stand still and see the Midianites, in the darkness of midnight, kill themselves. The Midianites thought each trumpet represented a thousand men, and they were right, for legions of the angelic hosts were present at that conflict, as they were with Elisha at Dothan and Hezekiah before the Assyrians. When we in our weakness do our best God does the rest. Great evils fall before spiritual forces when the supreme moment arrives.

Our weapons are not carnal. Our leader is the Prince of Peace, the Lord of love. His army are soldiers of the Cross, under the blood-stained banner of Calvary, who publish peace a take captives for Christ, echoing the Master's battle cry, "My peace I give unto you." His is the armor of righteousness, the sword of the Spirit, the power of love. Napoleon said, "Alexander, Caesar, Charlemagne and myself have founded empires upon force which have crumbled, but Jesus founded his empire upon love, and millions today would die for him."

Jesus is marching onward, "travelling in the greatness of his strength mightly to save." In this fight of faith inspired by moral convictions and spiritual power, we will soon shout "Thanks be unto God, who giveth us the victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ."

"By the Three Hundred That Lapped Will I Save You"

PROFESSOR BUSH thus describes the drinking test successfully made by Gideon's three hundred:

"They employed their hands as the dog employs his tongue—that is, forming it into a hollow spoon, and dipping water with it from the stream. The mode of drinking is often practiced in the East, and practice alone can give that peculiar tact which generally excites the wonder of travelers. The interchange of the hand between the water and the mouth is managed with amazing dexterity, and with nearly as much rapidity as the tongue of the dog in the same act. The water is not sucked out of the hand, but with a peculiar jerk is thrown into the mouth before the hand is brought close to it, so that the hand is approaching with a fresh supply almost before the preceding has been swallowed."

W. B. Wright says: "A dog drinking is the emblem of alertness. Watch him! If a leaf rustles he sees it and starts. Sights and sounds which elude your powers of observation arrest him. The most conspicuous distinction between the dog and the ox at water is this: The ox never heeds his master until his thirst is quenched; the dog never heeds his thirst till his master is obeyed. I have seen a hound panting with heat, his black lips baked, his tongue cracked, dart toward the cool spring. But his master's whistle arrests him at the brink and he darts back without a drop. I have watched drovers call, pound, goad oxen at the ford, but the beasts would not budge until their thirst was slaked. Both types you may have seen among the recruits enlisted in the army of the Lord."

THE LEADERSHIP TRAINING CLASS

By FRANK L. BROWN, Joint General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

Superintendent Junior Department

THE law of the Junior scholar's life is action, and the program must have in it go and snap in speech and song. Habits are forming in these years, and punctuality, promptness and reverence must be insisted on. The superintendent must know what he is to do next and there must not be a five seconds' pause between parts of the program. Variety in exercises, brevity in prayer, platform Bible drills, snappy announcements, bright music of a martial sort, are needed in this department. It is best to leave the lesson until well to the close of the program so that dismissal will follow the lesson after the closing prayer and hymn.

This is pre-eminently the memory age. Hymns and Scripture should be drilled into these Juniors. They enjoy this work. It is God's time to fill memory's storehouse against future use.

In Supplemental Lessons for the Elementary Grades (Board of Sunday School, M. E. Church, 1018 Wabash Avenue, Chicago) will be found suggested supplemental lessons for the Juniors to be taught from the platform or by the teacher in the class. This briefly includes:

Bible facts, divisions, names of books, Bible stories and characters.

Outline Life of Christ.

Scripture texts on giving, such as II Cor. 8: 12 and 9: 7.

Temperance texts, such as Prov. 23: 29-32; I Cor. 3: 16, 17.

Texts on sin and salvation, such as I John 3: 4; James 4: 17; Rom. 3: 10-25; Gal. 6: 7.

The Ten Commandments.

The Beatitudes.

Missionary texts. Mark 16: 15; I Chron. 16: 24; Hab. 2: 14.

The seven words from the cross.

Eleven appearances after the resurrection.

Church hymns memorized: "All Hail the Power of Jesus' Name"; "My Faith Looks up to Thee"; "From Greenland's Icy Mountains."

Special Bible Drill Suggestions: Scholars should be taught to mark their Bibles with special names for books and chapters, such as John, "Gospel of Love"; James, "Work"; 11th of Hebrews, "Faith" chapter.

The drills should include rapid finding of such important passages as the Ten Commandments, Solomon's prayer, the Shepherd Psalm, Moses' psalm, Isaiah's description of the Messiah, the Great Commandment, the Sermon on the Mount, the Beatitudes, the Magnificat, etc.

Also to find the longest verse in the Bible; shortest verse; longest chapter; shortest chapter; four verses alike (Psalm 107: 8, 15, 21, 31); the "Rest verse" (Matt. 11: 28); the "Greatest Verse" (John 3: 16); the "Last Command," (Acts 1: 8).

Or such tests as: "Find the verse: 'All have sinned and come short of the glory of God.' Where?" "Find the redemption verse. Where? What?" "Find a verse on love; prayer; faith; temperance; missions, etc."

Or an exercise in rapid finding of such passages as Psalm 91: 1; Matt. 11: 28; I Tim. 1: 18; Joshua 1: 9; Daniel 12: 3; Psalm 119: 165.

Drill in finding special chapters, such as the "Sin Chapter" (Rom. 3); the "Salvation Chapter" (Rom. 10); the "New Birth Chapter" (John 3); the "Atonement Chapter" (Isa. 53); the "Purity Chapter" (Ezek. 36); the "Love Chapter" (I Cor. 13); the "Abiding Chapter" (John 15).

An alphabetical drill may be tried, such as "A. All have sinned" (Rom. 3: 23). "B. Behold the Lamb of God" (John 1: 29), etc.

Experience guides us to look for a definite spiritual awakening between ten and twelve years. The Junior superintendent and teacher should watch carefully for an interest in God's call to the life at this time and guide to a decision. Many of our best workers trace the beginning of their Christian experience to this period. It was the time of my own clear conversion. Linked with conversion, with a clear recognition of Christ as Saviour and Lord, comes a desire to express this relation in these years in acts of service of a very practical nature. The superintendent should plan practical lines of service expression in gathering up magazines for hospitals, sailors' homes, sending flowers and picture card albums to children in Ten friends ask prayer for restoration of hearing for themselves or others.

Seventeen friends ask prayer for help or guidance in financial matters.

Thirty-one friends ask prayer for the granting of varied desires and needs, including one that a friend who is estranged from her family may be reconciled; a father and mother, that a son who is lost may be restored; a friend, that a nephew will be united with his wife and little ones; another, that a daughter may return home to her aged parents; another, that a dark stain may be removed from her reputation; another, that a friend may regain the power of speech.

Are Your Eyes Normal?

By C. Gilbert Percival, M. D.

If your eyes are normal, you are almost the exception nowadays.

But that does not necessarily mean that you must look forward to wearing eye-glasses for the rest of your existence whether you are wearing them now or not.

For it has been conclusively proven that eye troubles can be corrected by the proper kind of simple exercise.

Like many other functional weaknesses, the eyes when affected, lack the normal circulation of blood which Nature requires in order that the optic nerve shall work properly and the eye focus as it should.

Give the eye this proper circulation of blood, and if it is just a little weak, it will rapidly become strong again. If it has developed a more serious trouble in the course of years, normal circulation will so strengthen the eye as to make glasses unnecessary after that normal circulation has been re-established.

One instance, of my own knowledge, is of a man who had worn glasses for ten years because of acute astigmatism, and after properly exercising his eyes for just five minutes twice a day for a few months, could see perfectly without glasses and laid them aside. That, by the way, was six years ago, and he has never found it necessary to put glasses on again.

While this may seem remarkable in face of the fact that once a person puts on glasses he is usually condemned to wear them for life, yet it is not too much to expect in these days of Nature cures.

As a matter of fact, we might well be excused for marvelling that in these days of marked improvement in all treatments, that of the eyes has apparently stood stock still. It is inconceivable that, no matter how simple an eye trouble may be, you should have to put on glasses, yet this seems to be the only method of treatment so far practiced, outside of the exercise to which I refer.

The lack of progress in this direction has been particularly regrettable as time advanced, because at no period has mankind so sorely needed an efficient aid to strengthen the eyes than recently.

It is safe to say that the eyes have always been called upon to bear more strain than any of the other organs of the human body, and most nobly have they responded, but in modern life, with its striving and hustle, we do not realize what impossible demands we make of the eyes until they begin to weaken.

It is safe to say that the great majority of men put more or less tax on their eyes all day at business, then read their evening papers on their way home in a joggling train, and after dinner seek their recreation by either reading or going to a theatre or some function where their eyes are always busy.—And just remember, too, that a poor light, or lights misplaced, always put an extraordinary strain on the eyes.

Small consideration is also shown by our women folk for their eyes in the same, and in many different ways. In fact none of us ever think for a moment of whether we are taxing our eyes too much or not.

But the questions to be settled here are: Because our eyes weaken under the strain, must we wear glasses for the balance of our lives?

Also if we now wear eye-glasses, must we continue to do so?

And if the recent experience of thousands may be taken as an indication, the answer to both of these questions is decidedly NO!

If you restore the normal healthy circulation of blood to the eyes, their original strength will gradually and naturally return and re-assert itself and the eyesight become normal once more; this result has not been confined to young folks either, as old-sight has been corrected just as frequently as other eye troubles.

There is but one way to restore this healthy circulation of blood to which I refer, and that is by properly applied massage, and it may be informing to quote what eminent authorities have to say about this:

The New York Medical Record has said: "This (relief) could be gained by any means that would bring about an increased blood supply, and the most feasible plan seemed to be properly applied manipulation." This referred to so serious a condition as a cataract of the eye.

It is of course essential that the exercise be given in a manner that is absolutely safe, and cannot possibly injure the eye nor affect it in any manner other than beneficially.

In no instance of the thousands where this nature method has been used, has it done the eyes anything but good.

A very interesting booklet of facts about "The Eyes; Their Care, Their Ills, Their Cure", can be obtained on request, without charge, if you will write Chas. A. Tyrrell, M. D., 134 W. 65th Street, New York, and mention having read this in The Christian Herald.

If your eyes are affected in any way, and you would rather not wear eye-glasses for the rest of your existence, it will be worth while to send for this little book and learn all the facts about this help to Nature, its operation and its results.

LEADERSHIP TRAINING CLASS

series and orphanages, and to the sick in hospitals; acts of kindness and helpfulness in the home.

The Junior age is one of expression through hand, mouth, feet and body. These boys and girls are glad for a chance to use their hands in making maps in sand and paper pulp, and fashioning models illustrating life in Palestine. They like to decorate narrative Bible stories with pictures, pen and crayon. Handwork in the Sunday School (Littlefield) will show just how this can be done. A room to which scholars may be taken for this handwork would be of great service.

The Junior Department is for children 9 to 12, inclusive. Ability to read the Bible easily is a usual test for entrance to the Junior Department. The Bible should be given to the scholar in the Primary Department as a gift or reward for verse memorization.

In the smallest there should be at least one class of children of the Junior age. If possible there should be one class of boys and one of girls of this age. If the size of the school permits there should be a department for the boys and girls of this age, separated by walls or screened from the balance of the school. It will be better yet if there can be one or more classes of the nine-year-old scholars, another class or group of classes for the ten-year-olds, another for the eleven, and another for the twelve, the International Graded Lessons being used for each year. Where this is not possible the International Uniform or Graded Lesson can be taught the department as a whole by the department superintendent or teacher.

Experience has shown that boys and girls of these years have acquired something of the habit of class spirit and a simple form of class organization works well, such as class president, secretary and treasurer elected for a three or six months' term. This is the age when scholars like to receive credits for their work, and the class officers can look after credits for church attendance, Bible bringing, home work, etc. Absent members can be followed up by these officers and class giving stimulated by them.

A good department equipment would include maps, blackboard, class tables for the hand work, birthday cards, welcome letters, department buttons as suggested by the International Sunday School Association, Honor Roll (for attendance plus Bible bringing and daily Bible reading at home), a temperance pledge roll, models of Oriental house, sheepfold, well, etc., curios from mission fields, a missionary library of books recommended by the Missionary Department of the International Sunday School Association (1416 Mallery Building, Chicago), or the State Sunday School Association, songs printed on muslin or curtains, and a picture roll. I would even include for schools that have the facilities, a stereopticon for exhibiting missionary pictures, and teaching new songs. This plan is followed now in many schools with excellent results.

The student in training for primary superintendent should study the general books on Sunday school organization already mentioned for other officers in previous lectures, and, for specialization study, the following: After the Primary—What? (McKinney), The Junior Worker and His Work (Robinson), Making Men and Women (Robinson), Junior Stage in Character Building (Baldwin), Our Boys and Girls (Kennedy).

THE KIND CONDUCTOR

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

I STEPPED gratefully on to the trolley car and subsided, near the door, into the only vacant seat. It was a very crowded trolley car; crowded with men and women, half-grown children and little crying babies, and as I looked interestedly down the aisle I saw workmen in dirt-stained overalls next to women in broadcloth suits, prosperous people in fur-lined overcoats sharing their seats, unwillingly perhaps, with ragged immigrants.

It must have been extremely cold out on that back platform, for the conductor was holding his fingers before his face and blowing on them. He had a blue, pinched look about the mouth. As I smiled quite unconsciously out of the door, he pulled his lips frozen together and smiled back at me cheerily.

The conductor had a pleasant though rather commonplace face. He had tiny laughter lines around his eyes, deep smile wrinkles at both sides of the mouth. His sandy hair was brushed back from a high forehead, and his eyes, deep-set blue eyes, twinkled at some small joke even as he tried vainly to blow the numbness from his finger tips. I found myself imagining him with a beard and long white hair, and I almost laughed as I realized how much he would look like Santa Claus, or Saint Valentine, or any of the other merry-men of childhood, if he could suddenly become old.

A fat woman with a thin, just-beginning-to-walk baby started to lurch toward the door. The car was going very fast, so fast that she stumbled from side to side, while the frightened child, with a look of vague despair on its poor little face, reached blind, groping hands toward the firmness of the seats. Involuntarily I stretched out an arm to steady the little thing, but as I touched its small coat sleeve the conductor pushed open the door, lifted the child and steadied it until the car stopped. His eyes smiled as he handed it to the fat woman and watched her hurry off down some side street.

A little girl, a rather fluttery, nervous little girl with an old-looking face, stepped on at the next corner. She gazed hopelessly, helplessly at the conductor as she handed him her fare.

"I've got to go to the normal school," she told him, worriedly, "but I don't know how t' get there! The car doesn't go right past, does it?"

The conductor put the coin into his fares pocket and beat his cold hands against each other.

"I'll let you out, Miss," he told her kindly, at a corner just two blocks from the school. Walk straight away from the car tracks and the first big building you see will be the one you are looking for. I'll call out when we get to the street." And with the nervousness fading from her face the little girl passed inside.

A faded old woman and a pretty young one were sitting far to the front of the car. They had attracted my attention several times, for the young one had her arm protectingly around the shoulders of the old one, who sat leaning heavily back with closed eyes and pale, nearly gray face. They were both dressed shabbily in very neat clothes, and as I was wondering what their story might be I saw the girl get up and help the old woman to her feet. When I saw them pressing down toward the door, the one tenderly solicitous, the other with tight-drawn lips and halting step, I realized that the older woman was desperately sick. When they reached the platform the chilly-looking conductor smiled reassuringly at the girl as he stopped the car. While they stood hesitating in the doorway at the top of the cruelly long steps, he jumped to the ground and held up his arms. The old woman was a very little old woman and he was a very big conductor. Gently, tenderly, as a trained nurse might have done, he lifted her from the high place and set her on the ground.

"You're good," I heard her murmur; "she's very sick, my mother is, just out of the hospital—an' she can hardly walk."

The conductor didn't answer. He only grinned—a cheerful, radiant, combination Santa Claus and Saint Valentine grin. Then he climbed back on the platform again and pulled the bell rope.

The car was beginning to thin out, and as I gathered my things together I thought of conductors in general. I thought of the cross ones, who wouldn't wait, and the snappy ones, who wouldn't help, and the occasional surly ones who growled. I compared them with this conductor.

While I was doing it the car stopped at the corner and a man got on, a man who looked almost objectionably prosperous from the soles of his patent leather, cloth-top shoes to the tip of his shiny imported hat. He held a bill out and waited importantly for change, while his small eyes looked curiously at the face in front of him.

"I'm glad I haven't your job," he volunteered, not unpleasantly; "it must be pretty bad in winter out on the back platform in the cold!" Comfortably he snuggled down into the depths of his fur-collared overcoat.

The conductor switched open the door and held an Italian woman's heavy market basket for her as she clambered stiffly down. He pulled the bell rope before he answered.

"Oh, I don't mind it," he answered cheerfully as he handed out the change—"y' know I like it—rather." It was then that I decided to write this article.

I had arrived at my destination, for the car was slowing down to the right street. I got off slowly, and the conductor smiled at me with his happy smile while I stepped to the ground.

The car swung heavily, clumsily around the corner and I saw him plainly on the back platform—for the last time. He was blowing on his fingers to keep them warm.

YOUNG CHINA

pagoda. The bells chimed sweetly in the breeze that swept through them. From that pagoda extended a long business street through the heart of the city, terminating in a temple at the farther end of the city. For centuries the people have believed that a great dragon ran underneath that street, the temple being the head and the pagoda the tail of the dragon. No well could be dug in that street for fear of disturbing the dragon.

Outside the city of Peking is the most sacred spot in China. It is the Altar of Heaven, where for hundreds of years the worship of the God of heaven has been carried on by the emperor. This form of worship, the persistence of the idea of the true God, has been carried on for four thousand years. On a hot May day we stood upon the altar in an enclosure reminding one of the courts of Solomon's temple, the walls capped with tiles in gorgeous china blues and yellows. Chinese and Christians united with the Sunday school representatives from America in the dedication of that altar to the worship of the Christian's God.

Young China is getting ready for the task of building a republic founded on the Word of God, which shall go hand in hand with the sister republic of America in bringing in the ideals of a true Christian civilization.

A plot of ground 25 x 40 will grow all the vegetables required by a family of six or seven, if planted with seeds of a recognized quality. Every packet of Henderson's Seeds has behind it the knowledge and experience of 68 years of successful seed growing and selling. Most of the best methods of seed trials and testing originated with the founder of our house, and these have been improved from year to year through three generations of seedsmen and are today still the best. The cost of the seeds in your garden is really the smallest portion of your investment, and yet it is of the greatest importance. Henderson's Seeds are tested seeds.

Everything for the Garden

We want to send you our beautiful new 1915 catalog—204 pages, 8 color plates, 1000 illustrations—the most complete gardening catalog ever printed. Why be only Half Alive, Half Well, Half Vigorous?

I KNOW that I can easily, quickly and positively prove to you that you are only half as alive as you must be to realize the joys and benefits of living in full; and that you are only half as well as you should be, half as vigorous as you can be, half as ambitious as you may be, and only half as well developed as you ought to be.

The fact is that no matter who you are, whether you are young or old, weak or strong, rich or poor, I can prove to you readily by demonstration that you are leading an inferior life, and I want the opportunity to show you the way in which you may completely and easily, without inconvenience or loss of time, come in possession of new life, vigor, energy, development and a higher realization of life, success and happiness.

Become Superior to Other Men.

The Swoboda System can make a better human being of you, physically, mentally, and in every way. It creates a greater activity of the forces of life which in you are partially dormant, thus compelling them to become more alive and positive, enabling you to grow and evolutionize to a higher state of perfection. The Swoboda System can do more for you than you can imagine. It can so vitalize every organ, tissue and cell of your body as to make the mere act of living a joy. It can give you an intense, thrilling and pulsating nature. It can increase your very life. I not only promise it, I guarantee it.

Why Take Less Than Your Full Share of Life and Pleasure? Why Grow Prematurely Old and Lifeless, in Whole or in Part?

Are you living a full and successful life? Why not always be at your best?—thoroughly well, virile, energetic. Why not invest in yourself and make the most of your every opportunity? It is easy when you know how. The Swoboda System points the way. It requires no drugs, no appliances, no dieting, no study, no loss of time, no special bathing; there is nothing to worry you. It gives ideal mental and physical conditions without inconvenience or trouble.

Why Be Old in Body While Young in Years?

The Swoboda System of Conscious Evolution is No Experiment

I am giving it successfully to pupils all over the world. I have among my pupils hundreds of doctors, judges, senators, members of cabinets, ambassadors, governors, thousands of business and professional men, farmers, mechanics and laborers, and almost an equal number of women—more than two hundred thousand people have profited through this system.

WHAT OTHERS HAVE TO SAY

No woman or man is too weak, old, or too well to profit through the Swoboda personal mail instructions.

"Can't describe the satisfaction I feel."
"Worth more than a thousand dollars to me in increased mental and physical capacity."
"I have been enabled by your system to do work of mental character previously impossible for me."
"I was very skeptical, now am pleased with results; have gained 17 pounds."
"The very first lessons began to work magic. In my gratitude I am telling my croaking and complaining friends, 'Try Swoboda.'"
"Words cannot explain the new life it imparts both to body and brain."
"It reduced my weight 29 pounds, increased my chest expansion 5 inches, reduced my waist 6 inches."
"I cannot recommend your system too highly, and without flattery believe that its propagation has been of great benefit to the health of the country."

"My reserve force makes me feel that nothing is impossible, my capacity both physically and mentally is increasing daily."
"I have heard your system highly recommended for years, but I did not realize the effectiveness of it until I tried it. I am glad indeed that I am now taking it."
"Your system developed me most wonderfully."
"I think your system is wonderful. I thought I was in the best of physical health before I wrote for your course, but I can now note the greatest improvement even in this short time. I cannot recommend your system too highly. Do not hesitate to refer to me."
"You know more about the human body than any man with whom I have ever come in contact personally or otherwise."
"Your diagnosis and explanation of my brain trouble was a revelation to me. I have had the best physicians of my State, but your grasp of the human body exceeds anything I have ever heard or known. I have read your letters to many people, also to my physicians, who marvel at them."

Live the Thoroughly Successful Life!

Your Earning Power, your success, depend entirely upon your energy, health, vitality, memory and will power. Without these, all knowledge becomes of small value, for it cannot be put into active use.

The Swoboda System can make you tireless, improve your memory, intensify your will power, and make you physically just as you ought to be. I promise it.

MY NEW COPYRIGHTED BOOK IS FREE. It explains THE SWOBODA SYSTEM OF CONSCIOUS EVOLUTION and the human body as it has never been explained before. It will startle, educate, and enlighten you.

My book is not a dry treatise on anatomy and physiology. It tells in a highly interesting and simple manner just what you have always wanted to know about yourself.

You will cherish this book for having given you the first real understanding of your body and mind. It shows how you may be able to obtain a superior life; it explains how you may make use of natural laws for your own advantage.

My book will give you a better understanding of yourself than you could obtain from a college course. The information which it imparts cannot be obtained elsewhere at any price. It shows the unlimited possibilities for you through conscious evolution of your cells; it explains my discoveries, and what they are doing for men and women. Thousands have advanced themselves in every way through a better realization and conscious use of the principles which I have discovered and which I disclose in my book. It tells what CONSCIOUS EVOLUTION means and what it may do for you. It also explains the DANGERS OF EXERCISE and of EXCESSIVE DEEP BREATHING.

I offer my System on a basis which makes it impossible for you to lose a single penny. My guarantee is startling, specific, positive and fraud-proof.

Write for my FREE BOOK and full particulars to-day before it slips your mind. Make up your mind to at least learn the facts concerning the SWOBODA SYSTEM OF CONSCIOUS EVOLUTION for men and women.

PRACTICAL RELIEF WORK FOR EUROPE

BY THEODORE WATERS, Secretary of The Christian Herald

How the Committees Were Formed

THROUGH the kindness of Bishop J. C. Hartzell, the head of the Methodist Church of All Africa, the Christian Herald English Committee for the Relief of the Widows and Orphans of the War in Europe had already been formed. Its personnel is as follows: Dr. A. C. Dixon, chairman; Earl Grey, Duchess of Marlborough, Sir Robert W. Perks, Mr. Selfridge. As the Belgian refugees in England were being quartered as rapidly as possible among English families throughout that island, and as the need in Belgium was more immediately urgent, it was thought best to purchase a cargo of flour, peas and rice, take it to Belgium and have it distributed there under the auspices of a special committee. In order to assure safe conduct for this cargo, so that it might not be seized by the English, French or Germans, it was necessary to have it sent directly to the American Minister Henry Van Dyke in The Hague, where it could be reconsigned to American Minister Brand Whitlock in Brussels, from which point it could be distributed throughout Belgium.

So the way into Belgium lay through Holland, and the most available port of entry at the time of my visit was Rotterdam. I was in Rotterdam, while I was waiting for the trans-shipment of the cargo, that I came upon so many miserable Belgian refugees who had fled into this neutral country on the approach of the German forces. It was there that I saw men, women and children huddled together in the refining camps, in old factory buildings, even in the holds of barges. However beautiful Rotterdam may be in summer, in winter, with its maze of canals intersecting all parts of the town, it is a cold, damp and dismal place. The plight of these poor people was terrible. Holland, suffering under the blight of business stagnation, was unable to do more than look after its own poor. Nearly 500,000 refugees had quartered themselves upon her, and the unsanitary conditions which existed when I was there were the result of this sub-influx.

I have already written a description of the conditions as I found them. People needed food and clothes, and it seemed that the most urgent thing to do was to begin the formation of a committee, the whole organization of which might be completed by the time I got back from Belgium. Through the kindness of Captain J. F. Lucey, I was introduced to Mr. P. C. Jongeneel, an influential business man and banker who stood very high in the estimation of the community and who, giving up his ordinary pursuits, had worked practically day and night to further the charity work of the American commission. Mr. Jongeneel threw himself into the work of forming a committee heart and soul. I left him to go to Brussels, with the assurance that upon my return he would have, if not the whole committee, at least the nucleus of one for me.

As I have already written, the road to Brussels was beset with danger, but it came to pass that I was able, late one Saturday afternoon, to consult with American Minister Brand Whitlock in the American legation, and to invoke his assistance in forming the committee for the distribution of food for the widows and orphans throughout Belgium. We had felt that, as far as possible, it would be desirable to have our committees in these countries formed of Evangelical clergymen. Mr. Whitlock put out a call for all such as had remained in Brussels up to that time. (It might be mentioned that most of the clergy in Belgium are of the Catholic faith.) There are comparatively few evangelical clergymen in Brussels, and to Mr. Whitlock's call but one responded, Rev. Kennedy Anet, who is the general secretary of the Christian Missionary Movement in Belgium.

Mr. Anet proved more than willing to undertake the work of administering funds, provided it could be done with the assistance and practically under the auspices of Minister Whitlock. The latter, whose father was a Methodist clergyman, is very much in sympathy with the Christian Herald work, and agreed to take it under his auspices, and if possible to enlarge the committee. However, his great efficiency in bringing about the consent of the various governments not to seize such food, and his executive ability in providing for the distribution of food sent into Belgium by Americans, may make a further extension of the committee unnecessary.

BELGIAN PEOPLE WAITING TO FORM IN LINE FOR FOOD SUPPLIES

At the close of this article is a most enlightening letter from Mr. Anet.

LEAVING the work in charge of Minister Whitlock, I proceeded to return to Holland for consultation with Mr. Jongeneel. During my absence Mr. Jongeneel had been working assiduously to form the committee, and the list was quite ready when I returned to Rotterdam. The committee is as follows:

Honorary Chairmen: Mr. Marshall Langhorne, American chargé d'affaires, The Hague; Baron de Fallon, Belgian ambassador, The Hague; Colonel S. Listoe, American consul general at Rotterdam; Mr. Edward Knight, Belgian vice-consul, Rotterdam.

Members: Professor J. F. Niermeyer, Utrecht, chairman; Rev. J. Bergman, Rotterdam; Rev. W. H. Stenfort-Kroese, Rotterdam; Rev. H. H. Coryton, Rotterdam; Captain J. F. Lucey, Rotterdam, manager of the American Commission for Relief in Belgium; Mr. Paul Rolin-Hymans, Rotterdam, member of the Comité National de Secours et d'Alimentation; Mr. P. C. Jongeneel, secretary and treasurer.

Mr. Jongeneel declared it his intention to use the organization of the Dutch Central Committee for Relief to Belgian and Other Victims of the War, of which he is a member, and also to consult the Belgian minister at The Hague with regard to the best methods of distribution.

In Berlin, Germany, I consulted with the officials of the American embassy, and with Pastor Siegmund-Schultze, who is the honorary secretary of the Churches Committee for Friendship. We had known of Mr. Schultze and his work for some time previously. He is very well known in church circles in Germany, and no hesitation was felt in making him chairman of the German Committee. Upon his advice, the personnel of the committee was determined upon as follows:

Chairman, Pastor Licentiat Siegmund-Schultze, secretary of the Churches Committee for Friendship; General Superintendent D. Lahusen, general superintendent of the Evangelical Church of Berlin; Geheimrat Oberregierungsrat D. Nentwig, privy counselor of the Ministry of Education; Direktor D. Spiecker, president of the Central Body of Home Missions; Fräulein Gertrud Schwerdtfeger, secretary for the committee.

The above is the full list of the committee as made out at the time of my visit, but for operating throughout Germany other members will be added in different parts of the empire, particularly in Eastern Prussia, where the need is very great.

There was much more difficulty in forming the committee in Austria, where evangelical clergymen are not to be found so readily as they are in Germany. I consulted, in the first place, with American Ambassador Frederic C. Penfield, who was very kind and courteous and gave up much of his time to consideration of the necessities of the Christian Herald. He called in the assistance of Mr. Heingartner, who is vice-consul general in charge in Vienna, and who was most assiduous in his efforts to form a committee of evangelical ministers and others in sympathy with the Christian Herald Fund for the Relief of Widows and Orphans of the War in Europe. The committee, the headquarters of which are at Vienna I, Dorotheergasse 18, Vienna Evangelical Congregation, consists of:

President, Antonius Julius, pastor; vice-president I, Themessl Jakob, imperial counselor; vice-president II, Dr. Erwin Barta, I. R. professor; secretary I, Karl Ipolt, I. R. judicial counselor; secretary II, Klement Auer, civil service official; treasurer, Gustav Kaethner, director of the Evangelical Congregation; Rev. Josef Ploszek, Rev. Gustav Zwernemann, Mr. Eberhard Jergitsch, Mr. Ernst Kommerer, Mr. Heinrich Lutz, Mr. Leopold Raffelsberger, Mr. Franz Strasser.

The committee, in forwarding its formal acknowledgment of its existence to the Christian Herald, stated that it "gratefully appreciates the fact that in America also philanthropists have been found with open hearts and hands for the many unfortunates rendered destitute by the terrible war of nations now raging in Europe. The committee, which consists of representatives for the various provinces of the Empire of Austria, will accept with great pleasure the gifts tendered by generous hearts, and will gladly undertake their transmission to the persons for whom they are intended. May God bless givers and gifts alike."

Up to this writing it has not been possible to form committees in Russia, Serbia, or Turkey, but efforts are being made through diplomatic and other channels to appoint committees in those countries.

AS SOON as these committees had been formed the Christian Herald arranged to have a proportionate amount of the general fund transmitted to each. Arrangements were made with the Broadway Trust Company for the transmission of moneys to the various committees. For instance, the following was sent to the Rev. A. C. Dixon, D.D., Metropolitan Tabernacle, Newington Butts, London, E. C.:

Dear Dr. Dixon:

We take pleasure in confirming our cablegram to you of this date, as follows:

"New Year's greetings. Have deposited pounds sterling 2,057 in London and South-western Bank, Ltd., to credit of Christian Herald Committee for Widows and Orphans Relief, subject to your draft."

The above sum is the equivalent of $10,000. This sum has been appropriated for your committee, to be applied to relief work among the widows and orphans of the European War.

We will be glad to have you at your early convenience give some account of the operations of your committee, the publication of any extracts from which would be of general interest here. Very truly yours,

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

In the same way, 44,818 mark ($10,000) were forwarded to Pastor Siegmund-Schultze of the Berlin committee, and 55,555 kronen ($10,000) were transmitted to Gustav Kaethner, treasurer of the Austrian committee; the equivalent of ten thousand dollars were sent to Mr. P. C. Jongeneel, secretary and treasurer of the Christian Herald Committee in Holland, and 51,600 francs ($10,000) were transmitted to Pasteur Charles Wagner, chairman of the French committee; the sum total of food and money transmitted being therefore:

Christian Herald Belgian Relief Committee. Cargo of 600 tons of food distributed under U. S. Minister Whitlock's direction in Brussels, Antwerp, Louvain, Malines and other cities	$40,000
Christian Herald Holland Relief Committee (for Belgian refugees)	10,000
Christian Herald London Relief Committee	10,000
Christian Herald Paris Relief Committee	10,000
Christian Herald Berlin Relief Committee	10,000
Christian Herald Vienna Relief Committee	10,000
Total remittances to date	$90,000
Additional remittances will be made as fast as practicable.

THE following is a translation of a letter from Rev. Kennedy Anet, from Brussels, November 24: "I have just had the pleasure of meeting Mr.

THE SOLE WATER SUPPLY IN ANTWERP FOR DAYS

Theodore Waters, secretary of your honorable journal, and I wish to express to you and your readers the deep emotion I have experienced in learning through Mr. Waters the great feeling of generosity of the Christians of the United States in behalf of our Belgian people, millions and millions of whom are in the most desperate misery. Misery conditions are always great and they will be greater as the winter comes.

"Even in Brussels, where the well-to-do class see their resources diminish, and consequently have a hard time to do just what they would like and what they should do to help those who are without any resources, the situation is very sad, and will still become worse; they do a great deal and with great generosity for the working class, the greater part of whom are without work, for the women whose husbands are in the war, for the widows and orphans who are many already, for many people of the well-to-do classes, but who are now in poverty because they are either out of employment or their incomes have greatly diminished (clerks, commission salesmen, merchants, young ladies employed in the stores, etc.). I know some dreadful instances, and evidently very few in comparison with the real number of them, and I can't mention them all.

"Here are two examples: My wife found the other day a lady whose dress did not show her poverty, and who offered to sell her some potatoes. She was a lawyer's wife, and became a peddler to supply the needs of her large family. The day before yesterday I saw a young man, sick-looking, crying newspapers, few of which he could sell. I engaged in conversation with him, and found that he was a traveling salesman of a very important concern, and the firm had to dismiss him on account of the lack of business.

"But poverty in Brussels is nothing in comparison with what exists in the country and the industrial towns. There is lack of bread and of money to buy it with, even if there should be any.

"There are miners that walk from four to five leagues a day to get the bread in the towns and little villages, where they get help with great difficulty. There are hundreds, if not thousands of people in different parts of Belgium who are without shelter, without resources, ruined almost without clothes. The ministers of our Protestant Evangelist churches tell me that they don't know how they will be able to relieve the people, and more than one of the give to this cause a large part their salaries, while they are not sure if they will receive their salaries the following month, because we are ourselves at the end of our resources. Our church, independent of the state, is sustained by the gifts from the members, and by the generosity from abroad. It is not necessary to state that these gifts have either decreased or are missing entirely. I don't know how we are going to provide for the needs of our Protestant Orphanage that shelters forty boys and girls, and that, alas, will have to receive new orphans.

"But I cannot abuse the hospitality of your paper. The little that I have said is enough to make you realize the gratitude that I feel towards the Christians of the United States. I wish to express this gratitude, not only in my own name, but in the names of all my colleagues and churches, and nobody will contradict me if I say in the names of all the people. God bless the Christians of the United States for their charity. Allow me to tell them, quoting the words of the apostle Paul to the Corinthians: 'And God is able to make all grace abound toward you (You and the people of the United States.) II Cor. 9: 8, 11. In prayer meeting that we had yesterday we thanked God while thinking of you.

"I cannot close this letter that expresses, although imperfectly, our emotion and our gratitude, without saying how own town and our people feel grateful towards his excellency, M. Brand Whitlock, your distinguished minister to Belgium, for all that is doing in connection with his excellency the Marquis of Villalobar, the minister from Spain. "Accept, dear sir, for yourself, for the readers of the Christian Herald and for the Christians of the United States, my cordial greetings and my warmest thanks. Yours devotedly,

"KENNEDY ANET,

"Minister and General Secretary of the Belgian Christian Missionary Church."

BEFORE THEIR NEW HOME

THE broad streets of the City of Churches were brilliant with sunlight on New Year's Day, and gay with a vast festival crowd, which gave hilarious salute to the grotesque figures that composed a parade of revelry, headed by an absurd band, marching through the principal thoroughfares. For four miles the streets were lined with careless multitudes, intent on celebrating New Year's with all the circumstance of fun and frolic.

Two days later, the first Sunday of the New Year, the same multitudes thronged into the huge wooden tabernacle, built especially for the occasion (a picture of which appeared in a recent issue of the Christian Herald), to hear Evangelist Sunday at the opening sessions of the ten weeks' campaign for which preparations had been under way a long time. The press of that city states that 50,000 people heard the evangelist on the opening day and that 10,000 others were turned away.

So Philadelphia is now in the throes of perhaps the greatest revival of its history. The rude tabernacle, built to hold 20,000 people, is being packed every night, and some days twice. Church-goers are valiantly struggling with out-and-out sinners at the entrances to the building, not to force them in to hear the truth, but to get in ahead of them if possible. For once at least the irreverent of Philadelphia are willingly going to church. With a wide variety of emotions the faithful adherents of all the Protestant organizations are sitting in a joint assembly to hear the word of God preached in a manner and a language wholly new to them. Underneath it all, through it all and above it all is the heart-prayer of the Church of Jesus-Christ in Philadelphia that this remarkable campaign shall bring Philadelphia to its knees before God first, and then on its feet for service for him thereafter.

One of the great surprises occurred right at the beginning, at the first Tuesday night prayer meeting. There were 15,000 people at the afternoon session and nearly 20,000 at night according to the reports, and clergymen were present in the evening. The evangelist, with customary abruptness, merged his energetic into a prayer without notice to hearers, and before he had finished petition the building resounded again and again with applause. It was rather startling to many in the audience to hear in a prayer to God such expressions as this: "Bless the man who's just been elected superintendent of schools—what's his name—oh, Jacobs"; and in reference to the church body, the expression, "There's a fine bunch, Lord." "Don't miss a body, Jesus, from the mayor to the man who sweeps the streets," prayed Billy Sunday.

MAKING THE BEST OF IT

MONUMENT OF A PREHISTORIC RACE

A TOURIST'S IMPRESSIONS OF CENTRAL AMERICA

BY LLOYD LOGAN

interesting discovery. The native currency was so badly depreciated that $20 of my own money brought me $365. I spent the night and had breakfast at the one hotel, and received a bill for $27. The discount varies all of the time, and is different in different places.

A dramatic incident occurred just as the boat was landing. A little Spanish-speaking native girl, a Carib, was playing on the dock with a machete. Again and again she would lift up the huge, unwieldy knife, and twirl it around and around. There was danger in every movement. With horrified fascination all eyes were riveted on her. Her arm, I suppose, became suddenly exhausted. Down came the machete, and cut off the thumb of one hand.

The child screamed. One passenger fainted. Several of us hastened to the child's assistance. She repulsed every overture of friendliness. She refused to be consoled. With wonderful calmness she picked up her thumb, put it in her pocket, and ran away, to the consternation of every one. At the hotel we discussed the matter with the American doctor. He assured us it would soon be too late to graft the thumb on. A few volunteered to find the child, no easy matter in that labyrinth of tangled alleyways. In about an hour she was found, but it was very hard to persuade her to come to the hotel. She had kept the thumb in her pocket all of this time. The doctor washed the wound, and placed the thumb in position.

If it healed successfully, here was an opportunity to achieve renown, as almost an hour and a half had elapsed since the accident. The next morning she returned.

"It seems to be all right." The doctor spoke thoughtfully, after a careful examination. "Should blood poisoning set in, though, she will probably lose her entire arm, if not her life."

He hesitated. Up and down the floor he walked. Would it not be worth the while to take the chance, when it would place his name among the few? If he failed, who would know?

"The drama of life is not in the circumstance, but in the soul." Again he examined the little hand with the greatest care, and removed the thumb.

Guatemala! "The land covered with trees." A veritable truth. Millions of acres of these magnificent forests abound in mahogany.

I left Puerto Barrios for the Rio Dulce, "sweet water," which empties into the Caribbean Sea at Livingston, a port of entry and delivery, only about twelve miles from Puerto Barrios. I found that the steamer, an open boat with an awning, had an informal schedule of its own. No one could tell within three hours its time of arrival or departure. Sometimes we ran close enough to the shore to see the Caribs and Indians fishing from canoes, which were cut out of one solid piece of mahogany. They smiled and bowed, but none spoke. Some canoes were carrying wood. There were hundreds of these canoes.

Sometimes we saw the Indian women, who were quite beautiful, generally rather short, but well built, and with very long, coal-black hair. They were barefoot. Some wore a coat, most of them nothing above their waists. Their skirts were bright blue or red. These skirts were originally woven by the natives themselves, who used dyes of their own manufacture. English manufacturers now make all skirtings so much cheaper that the most of them are now imported. This particular race of Indians is fast dying out.

THERE were dozens of Carib boys swimming around the docks. They were remarkably agile in the water. We walked up a steep hill to the hotel, an Indian girl carrying my grip to my room. Many buzzards ran in front; as a first impression, it was most peculiar. There were soldiers everywhere; it seemed as if you could hear the bugle call every ten minutes.

As it happened to be market-day, there were countless venders, under fish, wonderful birds flying all above. The macaws especially attracted my attention. These beautiful scarlet birds, with great wings of blue and yellow, are a gorgeous sight when in whole flocks they swoop down from some great height in the dazzling sunlight; they are powerful flyers. Great numbers of aquatic birds on every river and lake are a peculiar characteristic of all Central America.

The scenic beauty of the place was uncultivated, unadorned, by human hands, just as nature planned it. On the side of this lake was the end of my trip. My destination was a banana plantation. Every one stopped work at the arrival of the steamer, as that was an event. A forty-foot launch brought the regular mails. Barges towed by dug-outs came every other week for bananas. It had been six months since the owner of this plantation had even seen any English-speaking people. Neighbors were thirty miles here or forty miles there; only one house was comparatively near them. But such conditions will now, in all probability, soon disappear in the coming development of Central America. The opening of the Panama Canal makes accessible the great mines of Costa Rica, Nicaragua, and Guatemala, and we may expect to see Central America once more an important source of precious metals.

It is hard to realize the great solitude of this plantation. There were no cows or horses. Beef was a luxury. Turkeys and chickens formed the principal meat diet, and were prepared differently from any way that Americans use them. There were eleven house servants, no Caribs as it was too far inland. These servants are almost slaves, held under the peonage system. Native huts have no floors. The beds are a skin, stretched taut. Everything was retarded, no progression anywhere. Once in a long while they have cane juice as a great treat.

I took some pictures of boys, who were very much interested. A woman saw the picture. She hurried to me, to plead with me that I would make one of her baby that had died. She insisted that she could borrow a baby, and that I could make the picture look like her child. Would I please do so?

The natives were so grateful for the simple gifts that I bestowed upon them that they pressed me to accept in return something of theirs; a calabash, carved and stained; an eating-vessel in three compartments carved out of one solid piece of mahogany.

As I was leaving a canoe arrived, having come four or five miles to buy ten cents' worth of lye to boil corn in. There were five women and three children in the party. The canoe was very tippy. There was a peculiar charm in the natural poise and graceful way in which they handled it. As I left the shore, farther and farther away, I could hear their musical laughter, adding joyous life to this last impression of beautiful Central America.

RUINS THAT SHOW ANCIENT USE OF THE ARCH

umbrellas and shades, selling innumerable native drinks, cigars, candies, cookies, and hot tamales. I bought a hot tamale, but did not have the change. "Oh, pay me tomorrow," the vender said informally, passing to the next customer.

We started at three the next morning to go up the Rio Dulce. The river runs between mountains for miles. No vegetation in a place meant that there had been a landslide, otherwise the growth was thick beyond description. There were vast numbers of mahogany and rosewood trees.

After a few hours' sail we came to a sharp turn, the ruins of an old Spanish fort frowning upon us. Then the river widened to a beautiful lake full of

THE JOY OF SERVICE

A SERMON BY REV. RICHARD BRAUNSTEIN*

"But Thomas, one of the twelve, called Didymus, was not with them when Jesus came." John 20: 24

ON THE evening of Christ's resurrection day, when the disciples met to sorrow over their absent Lord, Jesus suddenly appeared among them and turned their sadness into joy. But one who ought to have been there was absent. He was a man of prominence among the disciples. He was "one of the twelve." Why he was not present we are not told, but that he lost much by his absence we may be sure. The other disciples were made glad by the sight of Jesus and by the joy that accompanied his presence. They received special instruction from him on subjects of vital importance to the kingdom. They obtained his blessing and received the Holy Spirit. But Thomas was not with them, and he therefore missed the light and peace and joy which the presence of Jesus brought at that time. Thomas also missed the gift of the Spirit which made the other disciples so strong, and which fitted them to do such splendid work when they went forth freighted with the message of divine love, and by their preaching turned the world upside down.

Thomas may be regarded as a representative member of the church. There are many today who act just as Thomas did. They are the problem of our church life. They are not with the brethren when the Master comes. The absent disciples retard the progress of the kingdom. When the united army of God meets for inspiration and instruction, all forward movements are delayed because the ranks are depleted. Instead of spasmodic bursts of enthusiasm in first one section or another every Sunday should be a "go-to-church Sunday."

Two Kinds

THERE are two kinds of religious life after conversion, one or the other of which is adopted by every Christian, and by some both are tried at different times. One is to observe simply the external proprieties of religion, attend church once or twice on Sunday, occasionally partake of the Lord's Supper and endeavor so to live as to avoid bringing reproach on the church by un-Christian habits and practices. Many, sad to relate, look on this as the sum total of Christianity, and never advance a step beyond it. The other mode adds to this efforts after a high degree of spiritual life and a faithful attendance on the means of grace. Those who pursue the former course are often very much like Thomas in one respect. They are absent when Jesus comes, and they are great losers by it. They miss the blessings which the Master is ever ready to bestow upon the two or three, or more as the case may be, who meet in his name. They miss the strength which those blessings afford to the recipients. Thus they are poorly prepared to meet the issues and assaults of spiritual foes. After a time religious coldness and indifference result. Their piety may have outward forms and beauty—so has a polished statue—but it does not throb with life and virility.

Neglect is ruin. Let the merchant neglect his business, and he will soon close his doors. Let the sick man neglect to send for medical aid, and he is on the road to death. Let the man in the boat drifting with the current take his bearings as he hears the rapids else he will be lost. Caesar received a letter warning him of a plot to take his life. Caesar said, "I will read this letter tomorrow." He never had an opportunity to read that letter. Our time is brief. In the midst of life we are in death. Today is the day of days. Tomorrow may not dawn. Neglect is contagious. The example of absentees, especially the absence of those in official relation, is followed by others until all the spiritual interests are left in the hands of a few. When they meet Jesus is with them, and they are filled with his peace and the Spirit.

Rev. Edward Judson, son of the famous Baptist missionary, addressing the graduating class of Crozer Seminary, said: "All rich living is conditioned upon voluntary servitude. You can find illustrations in so many fields of life. The shepherd on the moor taking care of his sheep. You say he owns the sheep; but no, the sheep own the shepherd. If you are doing nothing but keeping pigeons, if you keep them successfully, you have to be their slave. The mother of a child is the slave of the child. The doctor to be a successful physician must be a slave to his patients. The teacher is a slave to the student. The minister is a slave to the church."

Belonging

CARRYING this thought into our theme, we may say that people speak truer than they think when they say: "I belong to the Methodist Church," or "I belong to the Presbyterian Church," or "I belong to such a denomination." They do. They belong to their church body and soul. When they joined the ranks they promised to be true, and serve them with their best interests. To be the kind of church members the Master would have them be, they must be the slaves of the particular denomination to which they belong. This is but another way of saying and illustrating what Jesus meant when he said: "He who would be great among you, let him be your minister." And he showed us by his wonderful life what he meant when he said: "The Son of Man come not to be ministered unto but to minister." This should be the law of every life. This is the law of life which makes men and women successful in other walks: the man in public life, the merchant on the corner, the village postmaster, the foreign missionary, the church officer, the housewife, the humble churchgoer.

All successful living is summed up in that word service. It takes character and consecration to get into the habit of servitude. Would you be great? Then you must minister. Would you be a great Christian? Then you must give yourself up to the principles that make for greatness in the energetics of the kingdom. The world was never so much in need of great church members as it is today. The church was never in need of a devoted membership as it is today.

Would you join the great company of men and women who are doing things worth while? Would you take your place in the ranks of toilers who are devout, devoted, earnest, manly, womanly, preaching Christ and illustrating his Gospel by their deeds? Would you take a hand in the renaissance of religion, for your own sake, your country's sake, for the sake of the future of the land and for the realization of the kingdom of God in the hearts of men? Never before was there such an opportunity to be something and to do something. There is a place for every one.

In a battle not long ago, a commander of a battalion came up to his superior and said: "Where shall I go with my men?" The superior answered: "Oh, go anywhere you like; there is good fighting all along the line." "Ye who are on the Lord's side, now serve him!" Can you sing? Then your place is in the choir. Can you teach a class in the Sunday school? Then you know where you are needed. Have you a sympathetic heart and are you sorry for the world's poor and needy? Then you shall be given a place among those who go about doing good. Are you gifted in organization? There are departments that are waiting for you to serve them. Are you gifted in prayer? The age needs a praying church. If Jesus has touched your heart and made it pure, so that you can see God, then you owe to the world your testimony. Do you love to hear the Gospel preached so that you are an eloquent hearer? Then you can be in your place on Sunday, and at the prayer meeting. The fact that you are on your way to the house of God is a good example to those who remain at home. You can swell the ranks by your presence. Your interest will be an inspiration to the minister. There is enthusiasm in numbers. The heart of many a man in the pulpit fails because the people do not rally around him. Empty pews, though of carved oak and cushioned, are depressing.

With a Mind to Do

THE age requires that the church impart the influence of light in darkness, leaven in flour, salt in corruption, peace in conflict, balm in sickness, comfort in sorrow and love in life. The age needs an active church. Not the church at play; not the church at feast or at rest, but the church at work. An inspirer of men, lifting the fallen, a witness for Christ, a winner of souls. A model for a working church is furnished by the returned Hebrews, building the walls of the temple and city. Men and women in our churches should be builders. Christians are the true builders. Nehemiah in speaking about the consecrated brethren who built so splendidly said "the people had a mind to work." The brethren today with their minds in Christ Jesus work.

Christian activity is not a sentiment, but a work. We believe there would be more frequent revivals were it not for the absent disciples. Instead of making part of the motive power of the church, they are a dead weight which the church is compelled to carry. All over the land today churches that were weak are going down beneath the burden. The army has enlisted for service, but it is marching in dress parade instead of going into battle. They are singing, "The Son of God goes forth to war, a kingly crown to gain." But they are not following in his train." The king's business requires haste.

The enemy is never idle. Men and women whose hearts beat high in the joy of service; who are interested in moral reform; who believe that the church is not out of date, decadent or dead; who believe that the Gospel is a ringing message that has power to save; who believe that Jesus is a living Personality, and not an ideal conceived in the brains and highly inflated imaginations of the evangelists; who believe that Jesus is the same yesterday, today and tomorrow." Such people have the power to close the saloon and house of ill-fame, make the Sabbath a real rest and worship day instead of a holiday; such people have the power to preserve our youth, keep sweet and pure the atmosphere of the home, pass kinder economic and social laws, manufacture ideals, build standards and take the multitudes of unchurched to concentrate their affections upon those things "which matter most." Such men and women by holding up the Son of God will enable a world dying in sin to see its Lord Saviour and live.

Consecration is the subtle fusion of the worker and his task, the union of work and worker, with which nothing of value or permanence is ever created. A French officer was wounded in the region of the heart in the battle of Waterloo. As the surgeon was probing with his needle the soldier said: "A deeper, doctor, and you will find a picture of an emperor." The church will succeed when the disciples of Christ have a picture of their Leader engraved upon their hearts. A divided love means a divided service. It takes all of a man all of his life to be a good soldier. Wonderful that metaphor of Paul's when summing up his life he said: "I have fought a good fight!" We have been reading of a great breath, concerning the details of the great war in Europe. We have been told that this will be the last great war. Let us sincerely hope that there will no longer clash swords. But let us also count the "great war" of the organized forces of Christianity against evil. Let every man, woman and child enlist. This is a war in which lives will not be taken but in which lives will be saved. It will be a war of humanity against humanity. It will be a war of humanity against the inhuman. Man will wage battle against the beast. The kingdom of heaven will be won. Jesus shall be made king. The church militant shall have become the church triumphant, and "the gates of hell shall not prevail against it."

The Field

THERE are multitudes today who are standing at the crossroads. Doubting, like Thomas, are asking to see the evidences of the risen Saviour. For them the Master stands waiting to reveal himself. The evidences are everywhere. They can be felt in the rising tide of religion. Missionaries are going into fields of service at home and abroad. The sound of a consecrated hammer is being heard in the land. The highways are being made resplendent with church buildings. Hospitals with open doors are standing waiting to give relief. Schools and libraries are being founded. A new era of conscience is stealing upon the land like the breath of an advancing summer. A changing order for the good of mankind is coming. Souls are being saved. Men are ashamed to do the things today they did yesterday. The halls of legislation have been touched by the Holy Spirit and better laws are being enacted. Races are coming together. We are each other's keepers. The world is learning that the Cross of Jesus was not in vain, but a divine necessity. The love of God in giving his Son is moving men to compassion. The sacrifice of Jesus is restoring the world.

DAILY MEDITATION

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR. LED BY REVS. J. H. JOWETT, D.D., F. B. MEYER,

The Sin of Prayerlessness

SUNDAY, January 24. I Samuel 12: 23. "God forbid that I should sin against the Lord in ceasing to pray for you." How few of us have placed prayerlessness among our possible sins. And how even fewer have placed the omission of prayer for others in the black list of sins against the holy Lord. We have called it thoughtlessness, negligence, or even apathy, but we have not named it sin. But how this word sin, as used in this unfamiliar relationship, broadens and deepens the ministry and obligation of prayer! My needy neighbor has a right to my prayers. They are to be regarded as part of his capital strength. They constitute a part of the forces which were purposed to make him victorious in all the battle of life. My prayers for him are part of his army. I control one of his vital equipments. Without my co-operation in prayer he is weakened and maimed. If I refuse him my prayers I deprive him of so much of his heritage. I defraud him. I wrong him in a far more deadly manner than if I refused to pay a material debt. I disclaim my spiritual riches, and he is impoverished in the central resources of the soul. I help him into moral bankruptcy by depriving him of his sacred dues. Thus I wrong my brother, and thus do I sin against God.

All this, I say, is a very lofty conception of the obligation of prayer. It is something we owe to others, and if we refuse to pay we leave them poorer. On the other hand, how uplifting is the conception that by my prayers I am increasing a man's moral capital. I am helping him to mobilize his spiritual forces. I am sending him army corps capable of meeting his enemy at the gate and overthrowing him. I may share in his warfare, and I may rejoice and glory in his triumph. J. H. J.

Our Home Life Under God's Care

MONDAY, January 25. Isaiah 4: 2-6. "The Lord will create over every dwelling-place a tabernacle in Zion and a cloud and smoke by day, and the brightness of a flaming fire by night." This imagery, of course, borrowed from the narrative of the Exodus, when the pillar of cloud rested on the camp place. To convey to Israel the true idea of oneness it was necessary to have special places, ceremonies and hours in which God was worshipped. These were separated from the ordinary scenes and vocations of daily life. There was a severe contrast and severance between the sacred and the secular, the holy and ordinary, the tabernacle with its services and the common life of the people. But Isaiah foresaw the time when this distinction would be abolished, and every home would be a holy place, every family a priesthood, every act sacred. Then life would be lived under the canopy of God's love, and in the darkest hour of the world's midnight there would be light in the tents of his people. Let us lift our home life to this level! There should be no room in the tabernacle, in the proximity of that sublime symbol, for anything unseemly, unwholesome, unclean, or impure. The thought of God's presence was enough to banish such intruders and fill the happy occupants with serenity and joy. Blessed are they that dwell in thy courts! "I will dwell in the house of the Lord forever." "Blessed be the man whom thou choosetest and causest to approach unto thee, that he may dwell in thy courts!" Pray and strive that your home may never drive you from the brooding cloud of God's gracious love and care. F. B. M.

Dealing with Slander and Detraction

TUESDAY, January 26. Nehemiah 6: 6. "It is reported . . . and Gashmu saith it." Gashmu is a great Bible character. His name occurs but once in Scripture: once in this chapter, at the point, where he is spoken of as Gashmu the Arabian, and again in the language of Sanballat, who quoted, who uses Gashmu's words to confirm his slander against the prophet Jeremiah: "It is reported that you are going to rebel against the king, and Gashmu saith it." As usually happens with slanderers and gossips, Gashmu is forgotten, if any man ever remembered him, and Nehemiah, the slandered prophet, is immortal. Nehemiah treated this false accusation with utter disregard. He did not rail and fight and raise a lot of dust. He just trusted God and went on about his work.

The Bible teaches that it is not the most successful course to bother about slanderers and those who bear false witness against their neighbors. Jesus' method was to point to his works as answer. "As a sheep before his shearers is dumb, so he openeth not his mouth." We are told how Frederick the Great, while riding through Berlin, discovered a crowd examining something on the wall. Upon nearer approach he found that it was a most disrespectful caricature of himself, and it was written so high that no one could tear it down. The crowd, upon seeing their monarch approach, anticipated a scene of passion on his part. Frederick looked at the picture, read the vile slander, and turning to a servant said, "Place it lower so that all may read it," then calmly rode away. In the cheer that broke from the crowd the famous hero of Silesia won his greatest victory. He had conquered himself and proved himself greater than his slanderer.

Let me remember today that it is not what Gashmu saith, or what some enemy saith, or what the world saith, but what the Lord saith that is the thing that counts. The man who is right with God can afford to bide his time, and "let them say."

The Vision Comes to Lowly and Humble Hearts

WEDNESDAY, January 27. John 2: 1-11. "But the servants which had drawn the water knew." Apparently they alone knew. The ruler of the feast didn't know, nor the wedded pair, nor the guests, nor the disciples. Perhaps Mary guessed, but only the servants knew; and they knew because they had obeyed. When, in a low and gentle whisper, the Master bade them fill the water jars with water, with hearty alacrity as though they knew what was coming, they filled them up to the brim. And when he again asked them to take some of it to the ruler of the feast, they never for a moment supposed that he was sending them on a fool's errand. They knew that it could not be water which they would have to carry. It was impossible to suppose that he would expose them to ridicule or rebuke; and as they dipped the cup into the great stone flagon, just filled with water, they expected it to be wine.

We may take great comfort here. We also are servants, serving at the great table of human joys, griefs or needs. We may have no vision beyond the common round, the daily task of duty; and yet, as we serve and obey, the gleams of the Eternal and Infinite may be granted to us, which they miss who sit at life's board, and to whom the wine of life is granted. Lowly and humble souls may see great sights, which are hidden from the wise and prudent; and some day they will hear Christ say, "No longer servants, but I have called you friends," and he will gird himself and serve them. F. B. M.

Tolerance the Stamp of Soul Greatness

THURSDAY, January 28. Matthew 7: 3. "And why beholdest thou the mote that is in thy brother's eye, but considerest not the beam that is in thine own eye?" Jesus was the most tolerant soul in history. His sympathy with men was greater because he could see farther than others into men's motives. When the disciples showed their littleness, Christ always came forward with his greatness of tolerant love, calling forth by his confidence in men traits that would have been silent or sullen before suspicion or intolerance.

Tolerance is the characteristic of big souls. It recognizes that we see in part; it never judges harshly. Like love of which it is a part, it believeth all things, it hopeth all things. The tolerant man sees the good before the evil in men, and its doctrine is suggested in the word of Robert Louis Stevenson, who said: "We can all be angry with our neighbor; what we want is not to be shown his defects, of which we are too conscious, but his merits, to which we are too blind."

Tolerance is the passive side of love. The East Indians conceive of God as both father and mother; tolerance is the mother side of God.

I visited the night court in New York, where poor, broken humanity comes up, night after night, to meet the judge of the court. One by one the manifest wrongdoers were dealt their sentences and passed in sad procession through the tragic door into the jail. Then a woman appeared, the very picture of regret; her misdemeanor was read to her and the judge said, "Did you speak these words and commit these acts?" "Yes, your Honor, I did," said the woman. "Why?" asked the judge. "I suppose it was because of my bad temper," said the woman sadly. The judge questioned her a bit farther, then said, "I am going to let you off this time. Please don't do it again. You can go." A thrill ran through the audience of curious spectators. The eyes of women and of strong men glistened with the quick, impulsive tears that answer unsought the vision of things big and generous. A discerning judge had seen deeper than the act. Judgment was mixed with tolerance, with mercy.

Thus God judges us in love—in tolerance divine. Shall we be less tolerant with our fellow men than is our God with us? C. S. C.

The Secret of Nearness to God

FRIDAY, January 29. Ephesians 2: 11-22. "Made nigh in the blood of Christ." We have not to try to get nigh, we are nigh. Esther the queen, before she dared enter the presence of the king, called for a fast of three days and nights, and then had to stand in the court of the king's house, on the chance of the golden scepter being extended to her. But no such formalities or delays are interposed between us and our Father. By the sacrifice and death of our Lord, God has in him put away every barrier between us and himself. There is absolutely no formality to be observed, save that we have confessed and put away known sin, and have put on that raiment of white robes which, to use the expressive language of the Apocalypse, have been washed in the blood of the Lamb. Thus arrayed, with the kiss of forgiveness on our cheek, the ring of never-ending love on our fingers, and the shoes of loving obedience on our feet, we may come with boldness to the throne of grace, to obtain mercy and find grace to help us in our time of need.

The one important matter is not only to believe generally that we have access by the One Spirit to the Father; but to believe particularly and act upon it. Do not try to feel the nearness, but affirm it and act upon it. The way into the Holiest is open, but you must enter it for yourself; and as you do so, you will realize your nearness to God, and you will perceive that you are one with all others who draw nigh.

So near, so very near to God,
I cannot nearer be;
For, in the person of his Son,
I am as near as he.

Drawing Men to Christ

SATURDAY, January 30. John 1: 42. "And he brought him to Jesus." When Andrew brought Simon Peter, his brother, to Christ he performed the noblest action of his life. He became the preacher by proxy at Pentecost. He lived in the wonderful career of the great apostle. He wrote and spoke through his brother. Should we not often say to our friends out of Christ, "Come and see him. He has saved me; he will save you. We have found him of whom Moses and the prophets wrote. Everlasting is his dwelling place, heaven his home and love for humanity his passion."

When Senator Dolliver's father was visiting him in Washington city the aged man was introduced to the Italian ambassador. During the conversation Mr. Dolliver said to him, "How is your soul?" Then he quickly explained his question, saying, "Are you a Christian?" The ambassador replied, "I am a Roman Catholic." Mr. Dolliver, soon after, at the age of ninety years, passed home to God. The ambassador was the first person to bring a floral offering for the funeral. He asked to look upon the silent face of the deceased with the relatives, for he remarked, with tears in his eyes, "Mr. Dolliver was the only one who ever said to me, 'How is your soul?'" What a good watchword that would be for Christian people everywhere. E. W. C.

men to a deeper devotion. Prodigals are coming home. We are standing in the doorway of that new era when all the world shall sing the "new song," and when the hosts who at present know not God shall attune their faith to the music of the "Name which is above every name." Then may it be said to them as Jesus said to Thomas: "Because thou hast seen, thou hast believed; blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed."

THE WAR IN EUROPE *

BY ANTHONY ARNOUX

European journalist of many years' standing; military critic, staff writer of the Paris Daily Mail and Le Temps; contributor to l'Indépendance Belge

THE dramatic event of the first week of the new year has been the sinking of another British battleship, by either a mine or submarine, probably the latter. The victim in the present case was the Formidable of the pre-dreadnought type, and the scene of the catastrophe was somewhere off the East Devon coast. The British admiralty did not, in its announcement of the disaster, give the exact locality, but we are informed from Berlin that it took place near Plymouth.

The vessel was a sister ship to the Bulwark, which blew up some weeks ago at Sheerness, and though of an old type, was still capable of rendering service of value. The loss of life is not known absolutely, but is in the neighborhood of 550.

This brings the total British naval losses since the beginning of the war to this date up to about 5,700, or about 2,000 more than those of the Germans. This is a very small loss, all things considered, but in a navy losses are more important than in an army, for the reason that sailors trained to naval routine and duties are more difficult to replace than army privates, to say nothing of officers.

Through the mediation of the Pope the warring nations have agreed to exchange such prisoners as they may have who are no longer capable of re-joining the army, and this exchange is about to begin, under the auspices of the Geneva Bureau of Prisoners of War.

The Germans claim to have had at the end of the year in their prisoners' camps (excluding interned civilians and prisoners in transit from the front), 3,459 French officers and 215,905 men; 3,575 Russian officers and 306,290 men; 612 Belgian officers and 36,852 men; 492 British officers and 18,828 men; a total of 586,013.

Russia claims to hold as prisoners of war 1,149 German officers and 134,709 men, while France and England, between them, claim to hold about 135,000 Germans of all ranks.

There are really no reliable figures concerning the Austrian prisoners; Russia claims to have 221,000 Austrians, and Austria also claims to have 165,000 Russians, but I am rather skeptical as to the reasonable exactness of these figures.

The British government has replied to the protest of the United States against interference of war vessels with neutral marine vessels and their cargoes. The answer is signed by Sir Edward Grey, British secretary of state for foreign affairs, and was cabled by Ambassador Page from London January 7. Its tone is said to be conciliatory, and while defending the policy of England as to seizure of suspected ships, suggests that the British Government will be glad to agree with our government upon some plan by which mistakes can be avoided and neutral owners of ships and cargoes fully insured against injury. The note is preliminary to a reply in full detail.

Greece, it is said on seemingly good authority, has called up all her army reserves both at home and abroad, the latter being required to report to the colors by March 1. This action on the part of Greece has caused great uneasiness in Bulgaria, and the Bulgarians are apparently preparing for the worst. The treaty which terminated the second Balkan war satisfied none of the contending countries and left great bitterness, particularly between Greece and Bulgaria.

It will not be surprising at any date, but a little nearer the spring, to see these two countries at war. If this comes to pass it will probably involve Rumania as well, and possibly Italy. Spain and Switzerland seem to be among the very small number of

GERMANS LYING IN WAIT TO MAKE A SURPRISE ATTACK

European countries which will tainly be able to keep out of the war permanently.

It is said to be understood that soon as the weather is settled the Allies will land an army at some point in Denmark and make a land attack on the Kiel Canal, which is the key to Germany's naval power. Pressure is being put on Japan to send troops to Europe, but unless she gets a high price for such action it is doubtful whether she will do so.

The Karlsruhe and the Dresden have so far succeeded in completely eluding their pursuers and have apparently vanished from the ocean. All probability they have taken refuge in some very out-of-the-way place will not again be heard of until the end of the war, though this, of course, is only surmise.

The name of Garibaldi, the hero of Italian unity, has been represented this war by his grandsons, who have organized a legion of Italian volunteers to aid the French cause. One grandson was killed about two months ago and on December 30 another, Brignone, fell.

Among other interesting news events of the last week has been the complete return of the French government to Paris.

Persia, not as a nation, for Persia hardly exists as that, but as an aggregation of separate tribes, the most important of which is the Jurds, has had her lot with the Turks. During the past week there has been considerable fighting on Persian soil between the Russians and Turks, the Persians supporting the latter. Since the event of Persia which culminated in the dismissal of the American director of finances, Shuster, through Russian influence, and the practical annexation to Russia of northern Persia and the establishment of a Russian protectorate over southern Persia, there has been strong anti-Russian feeling throughout the country and the nomadic tribes have apparently only been waiting an opportunity like the present to convert this hostile feeling into hostile deeds.

The Russo-Turkish campaign in the Caucasus is still considerable and a puzzle. For weeks the Russians have been reporting victories of more or less importance and chronicling a continuous advance into Turkish territory. It was, therefore, a little surprising in the very early part of the week to find the Turks claiming, and the Russians admitting, that the fighting was going on in Russian territory not more than sixty miles from the frontier, and that there were no Russian troops in Turkish territory.

The Turks, operating in two columns, had succeeded in capturing Ardahan, a Russian fortified town forty-five miles northwest of Kars, and also had penetrated to Samsun. Later in the week the Russians announced that at the last place they had totally defeated the Turks, and of the two opposing camps engaged had taken one entire army corps prisoners and had practically surrounded the other, besides routing the enemy at Ardahan.

These feats of arms were made the subject of a telegram of congratulation by the Grand Duke Michael to General Joffre. These events have, as yet, however, received corroboration, and remembering the great Russian victory in Poland of four or five weeks ago, which gave rise to a similar telegram, which victory did not then after materialize, until we receive corroboration perhaps an open question on the subject will be most advisable.

The allied fleet is still continuing the attack on the Dardanelles, with what result during the week, aside the sinking of a torpedo boat, not know. The Turks have concentrated a large army, said to be about 200,000 strong, in and around Constantinople, and apparently intend to defend the city to the last.

We have little or no news from Egypt all but little from the fighting in Africa, though it is officially stated that compulsory military service has been proclaimed in the British South African Union by General Botha, the object of which is stated to be to provide sufficient troops for an attack in force on the German colonies of German East Africa and German Southwest Africa.

On the western battle line, from the Channel to the Swiss frontier, operations during the whole of the past week have been very greatly interfered with by the weather. The French themselves say that the perceptible improvement which can be noted in their entire offensive should be attributed to the incessant rains which soak the ground and make operations everywhere almost impossible.

Nevertheless the Allies have made slight gains on both extremities of the line, particularly on the eastern end in Alsace. A very considerable army, under General Paul Pau, the one-armed hero of the former Franco-Prussian war, has succeeded in penetrating well into Alsace, capturing and holding several important points. This has enabled it now to take up a position directly threatening the important town of Mülhausen, which earlier in the war they once held. On the whole, the situation here is favorable to the Allies at the present writing, and may grow more so.

On the other end of the line of battle, between Ypres and Nieuport on the Channel, the Allies have made also a perceptible advance at points. The forward movement has been measured in distance as much as a mile and a half, which, considering the conditions of the terrain and its defenses, is considerable.

On the rest of the line of battle the changes have been slight, though at times the fighting has been quite severe in spite of the weather. It would not be at all surprising if the positions on this line of battle remained about as they are for some time yet.

The bombardment of the Austrian naval port of Pola continued during the week, but without definite results, as far as forcing the port goes, though two Austrian battleships are said to have been severely damaged in the fighting. One of these ships, the Viribus Unitis, is one of the largest and most important ships of the Austrian navy, and hence a severe loss. The other, the Redetzke, is smaller. There is no news of the Servian or Montenegrin campaign of moment.

Trouble seems to be brewing in Albania as a result of the Italian occupation of Avlona, largely blamed to Greek intrigue.

The fighting in Galicia during the week has been, on the whole, favorable to the Russians. They have been able to retake Tarnow, on the railroad from Cracow to Lemberg, and have also more than held their own in the direction of Gorlice. The report, however, that they are making a serious advance into Hungary through the Carpathian passes is probably at present more of a hope than a fact.

The Polish campaign has been greatly hampered by very deep snow and by severe storms, which have made the German advance slower than might have been expected. The most important development during the week has been the capture by the Germans of Borsimow, a strategic point of importance lying nearly four miles to the eastward of the junction of the Rawka and the Bzura rivers and controlling the direct highway from Lowicz to Warsaw.

Movements are also being made to the north of the Vistula, and on Kielce in South Poland, the objectives of these movements being the two fortresses of Neogeorevsk and Ivangorod, respectively. The British have sent several general officers to the aid of the Russian commander, with the result that since their arrival Russian strategy has considerably improved.

Both the Germans and the Russians are fitting out river steamers as gunboats for use on the Vistula, the Bug and the other Polish rivers, thus reviving fighting of the character of that seen on the Mississippi during our Civil War.

THE RETURN OF POLLYANNA

SYNOPSIS OF WHAT HAS TAKEN PLACE: Mrs. Carew, a rich Boston woman, almost as a recluse in sorrow over the disappearance, years ago, of a little nephew Jamie. Her sister, Miss Wetherby, was Pollyanna's nurse during her stay at the Sanatorium where she was so wonderfully brought back to health and strength by Dr. Ames after her accident. Miss Wetherby persuades Mrs. Carew to invite Pollyanna to spend the winter with her, feeling that the result will be her restoration to health. Letters from Miss Wetherby and Dr. Ames persuade Dr. and Mrs. Chilton to let Pollyanna go, they themselves planning to spend the winter in Europe. Pollyanna is greatly delighted with Mrs. Carew's magnificent home on Commonwealth Avenue and with all that she has in Boston. At the end of her first week she goes into the Public Garden, where by her observation and her description of "the glad day" she starts an ex-convict toward a useful life. Finding a young woman from temptation, leaving the park, Pollyanna wanders in the direction, loses her way, is rescued and brought home by a little newsboy. Some weeks later she meets her newsboy friend, Jerry, in the Public Garden. He has just wheeled up a little boy, his adopted brother, to spend the day in the park. Pollyanna learns that the boy's name is James; that his father is dead, and he cannot remember his name; that he loved books, one of which James still owns and reads. She is confident that he is the lost Jamie. The boy goes to come to the park for several weeks. Pollyanna is in despair, as she does not know how to find him. One day Jerry comes to Mrs. Carew's home to say that his foster brother is ill and wishes to see Pollyanna. Mrs. Carew is willing to let her go, but Pollyanna, in her absence, finally acknowledges that she thinks the sick boy is Jamie. Mrs. Carew decides to go to Jerry at once. They find Jamie and his foster brother in wretched circumstances, but, to Mrs. Carew's amazement, the woman refuses charity.] chauffeur to slam the door upon them before she pleaded:

"Dear Mrs. Carew, please, please say that it was Jamie! Oh, it would be so nice for him to be Jamie."

"But he isn't Jamie!"

"O dear! Are you sure?"

"No, I'm not sure—and that's the tragedy of it," she moaned. "I don't think he is; I'm almost positive he isn't. But of course there is a chance—and that's what's killing me."

"Then can't you just think he's Jamie," begged Pollyanna, "and play he was? Then you could take him home, and—" But Mrs. Carew turned fiercely.

"Take that boy into my home when he wasn't Jamie? Never, Pollyanna!"

"But if you can't help Jamie, I should think you'd be so glad there was some one like him you could help," urged Pollyanna, tremulously. "What if your Jamie was like this Jamie, all poor and sick, wouldn't you want some one to take him in and comfort him, and—"

"Don't—don't, Pollyanna," moaned Mrs. Carew, turning her head from side to side, in a frenzy of grief. "When I think that maybe, somewhere, our Jamie is like that—"

"That's just what I mean—that's just what I mean!" triumphed Pollyanna, excitedly. "Don't you see? If this is your Jamie, of course you'll want him; and if it isn't, you couldn't be doing any harm to the other Jamie by taking this one, and you'd do a whole lot of good, for you'd make this one so happy—so happy! And then, by and by, if you should find the real Jamie, you wouldn't have lost anything, but you'd have made two little boys happy instead of one; and—"

"Don't, Pollyanna, don't! I want to think—I want to think."

Tearfully Pollyanna sat back in her seat. By a very visible effort she kept still for one whole minute. Then, as if the words fairly bubbled forth of themselves, there came this:

"Oh, but what an awful, awful place that was! I just wish the man that owned it had to live in it himself—"

Mrs. Carew sat suddenly erect. Her face showed a curious change. Almost as if in appeal she flung out her hand.

"Don't!" she cried. "Perhaps—she didn't know, Pollyanna. Perhaps she didn't know. I'm sure she didn't know—she owned a place like that. But it will be fixed now—it will be fixed."

"She! Is it a woman that owns it, and do you know her? And do you know the agent, too?"

"Yes," Mrs. Carew bit her lips. "I know her, and I know the agent."

"Oh, I'm so glad," sighed Pollyanna. "Then it'll be all right now."

"Well, it certainly will be—better," avowed Mrs. Carew with emphasis, as the car stopped before her own door.

Mrs. Carew spoke as if she knew what she was talking about. And perhaps, indeed, she did—better than she cared to tell Pollyanna. Certainly, before she slept that night, a letter left her hands addressed to one Henry Dodge, summoning him to an immediate conference as to certain changes and repairs to be made at once in tenements she owned. There were, moreover, several scathing sentences concerning "rag-stuffed windows" and "rickety stairways," that caused this same Henry Dodge to scowl angrily, and to say a sharp word behind his teeth—though at the same time he paled with something very like fear.

The matter of repairs and improvements having been properly and efficiently attended to, Mrs. Carew told herself that she had done her duty and that the matter was closed. She would forget it. The boy was not Jamie—he could not be Jamie. That ignorant, sickly, crippled boy her dead sister's son? Impossible! She would cast the whole thing from her thoughts.

It was just here, however, that Mrs. Carew found herself against an immovable, impassable barrier: the whole thing refused to be cast from her thoughts. Always before her eyes was the picture of that bare little room and the wistful-faced boy. Always in her ears was that heartbreaking "What if it were Jamie?" And always, too, there was Pollyanna; for even though Mrs. Carew might (as she did) silence the pleadings and questionings of the little girl's tongue, there was no getting away from the prayers and reproaches of the little girl's eyes.

Twice again in desperation Mrs. Carew went to see the boy, telling herself each time that only another visit was needed to convince her that the boy was not the one she sought. But even though, while there in the boy's presence, she told herself that she was convinced, once away from it, the old, old questioning returned. At last, in still greater desperation, she wrote to her sister and told her the story.

"I had not meant to tell you," she wrote, after she had stated the bare facts of the case. "I thought it a pity to harrow you up, or to raise false hopes. I am so sure it is not he—and yet, even as I write these words, I know I am not sure. That is why I want you to come—why you must

Are We Keeping Up the War?

THE American people do not seem to have waked up to the fact that along with our prayers for peace and our expressed hope that the time might soon come when we could take some step to induce the belligerent nations to discuss peace, we have been sending to Europe guns, ammunition, powder and other material to aid the hostile armies to blow one another to pieces.

Here are the facts, so far as can be learned at present: In trade circles it is estimated that every week three million cartridges are shipped from the United States to one of the warring nations. A great American steel company is said to be under contract to deliver to the same government nine hundred steel howitzers within eighteen months. Another of the powers at war is getting from one American arms company two hundred thousand rifles, with two hundred million cartridges, and from another two hundred thousand rifles of .303 caliber, with two hundred million cartridges, and a half million .22 rifles with accompanying ammunition. From a single American firm seven million pounds of powder are to go to one belligerent power, four million to another. It is also reported that four million aerial arrows have been ordered in America by one of the fighting nations. These are but isolated items in the long list of the ghastly business.

Here is a definite, positive step for the American nation to take. It must extricate itself from this league of blood.

What does God think of our prayers for peace? He answers now as he answered through Isaiah long ago: "When ye spread forth your hands I will hide mine eyes from you. Yea, when ye make many prayers I will not hear. Your hands are full of blood."

One brave man stands out clean and strong from this tangle of murder. Clarence H. Howard, president of the Commercial Steel Company, Granite City, Ill., refused an order of two million dollars' worth of shrapnel for one of the warring nations. Hear him, not only America, but Europe and the world: "All the steel plants in the world, and all the battleships and all the firearms, are not so wonderful and valuable as one human life, with a soul wrapped up in it."

If it were your baby he was talking about you would say that this language is not extravagant. You think of him, with his soft fingers and his laughing eyes, and you know he would weigh down the world in the balance. Yet the men who are being torn to pieces in Europe today were once like him. Many of them are still boys. Their warm blood is being shed in rivers, their flesh rent, their limbs torn asunder. And we—we, the American people, who prate of peace and pray for peace and talk of brotherhood and helpfulness—we have helped to do it and are helping to do it every day.

SHAME! We have slumbered too long. It must be stopped. And stopped now!

It is not a question of dealing with one side or the other—of befriending one to the disadvantage of the other. The real point is that we should not be in this shameful traffic at all.

A resolution has already been introduced into Congress to prevent these shipments to Europe's armies which link us with their crimes. One of the authors of the resolution declared the other day in a rousing speech to the House: "We advised against loans to belligerents, but we now strain at a gnat and swallow a camel by allowing the shipment of just the things these loans were to buy."

Congress is your servant. What do you want it to do about this? You have a voice to speak and a hand to write. Tell your representatives in the House and Senate what they must do. Tell them—in order that you yourself may be free from this stain of blood that clings now to our hands.

Concerning Quitters

SOME friend, who has probably met with a disappointing experience, suggests that we should invite some pastor with a trenchant vocabulary to write a sermon on "Quitters." The idea is by no means a bad one. The natural history of the quitter has yet to be written. It should begin with childhood in order to be complete. As a boy he quits school, deeming study a bore, and goes out into the world only to discover that it has no place for a quitter. The youth goes on leaving one job after another until he becomes a jack-of-all-trades and an undesirable. The man who goes into business and after a spell finds it not what he expected, quits a loser because he hadn't the grip to hold on, or the common sense to know that experience must precede profit.

And so it is in all the relations of life. Quitters are always losers. The world makes progress, but it is due to the active, steady, self-reliant workers—the men who spur brain and body to meet the demands upon their energies. It is those who toil in the study, the forge, the laboratory, the machine-shop, the field, the counting-room, the store, who are the sons of progress—never the quitter. For him there are no honors, no rewards.

Even in the spiritual life we find the quitter, and that is the saddest of all. Men and women grow cold and indifferent and backslide into worldliness. A simple event, such as a change of residence, is often the excuse for a whole family abandoning their church connection. With a too willing ear they listen to the call of the world and the allurements of sin. They shake off spiritual restraint and simply quit.

There is only one way to live: find your vocation, let it be the best you can, and stick to it. Find your place in the great Christian family and honor it by consistent, loving, earnest, unselfish devotion. Be true to God, true to your religion and true to your convictions. Never quit; go on working and striving on these lines and the great promise will come true: "Be thou faithful unto death and I will give thee a crown of life."

Progress in the Philippines

IT IS to be regretted that the question of Filipino independence should have been raised again at this time, having the aspect of a political issue. This nation is pledged to train the islanders with a view to ultimate self-government, but the duty is one that cannot be performed in haste. Only a small percentage of Americans have any definite impressions regarding the present fitness of the Filipinos for independence, and it is not surprising that the wisdom of such a proposition should be very generally doubted. Those who know the islands and the people well, and who can speak with authority on the subject, are united in the opinion that the time for self-government has not yet come. Ex-President Taft holds that it will take two generations to train the Filipinos to the point where they can be trusted to intelligently conduct the affairs of a republic, and that to grant independence now would be "a crime against civilization." It should be remembered, even considering all the progress which has unquestionably been made, that something like ninety per cent. of the Filipinos are still illiterate. The agitation for independence springs from the unenlightened population, who are like soft clay in the hands of ambitious political manipulators. Among the enlightened minority, who know the weakness and perceive the danger ahead, there is no demand for independence now, but rather a conservative opposition to it. And yet we are not disposed to agree with those extremists who predict anarchy and chaos in the archipelago if our authority should be withdrawn, nor to approve Mr. Taft's gloomy prognosis in which he announces the conviction that if independence be granted to the Philippines before 1920, the worst conditions witnessed in Mexico will be duplicated in that country. These unhappy pictures are no doubt somewhat overdrawn, but there is quite enough of serious truth in the situation to warn us to proceed with caution if we would avoid the risk of our sixteen years of effort going for naught.

The First Step

WHAT may prove to be the first real step toward international federation and world-peace has been taken in Congress, in obedience to public sentiment. On January 2, 1915, the Hon. Charles F. Curry, from the Third California district, introduced in the House the joint resolution which is printed on page 58 of this issue. It was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. Three days later, it was introduced in the Senate by Mr. Robert L. Owen of Oklahoma. Thus the matter is now squarely before both Houses.

No movement of this character can escape hostile criticism, and even derision, at the outset. It will be assailed as an idealistic and unrealizable scheme, wholly outside of the domain of legitimate legislation. We must be prepared for such an attitude the part of those who have no vision beyond things of the moment. It is well, however, to a beginning, even though months and years elapse before substantial progress is attained.

It is gratifying, however, to note that leading American journals are taking up the World Federation idea in earnest. Hon. Joseph H. Choate, writing on "America's Future Position" (after this was the Review of Reviews, expresses the belief when the time comes for peace, this government "not only be called into consultation by the warring nations when they are no longer able to keep up fight, but will practically be able to dictate the terms of peace between them." Hon. James A. Donald, the Canadian statesman, writing in the publication, says: "A new-born world already be to heave above the horizon line. It will be a world of free nationalities, a world of righteous democracies, in which there must be no supremacy of servitude; a world where no master will be all on land and no mistress needed on the seas. Every nation, great or small, must be master in its house. The might of all must defend the rights of each." "When this war ends," writes Prof. Josiah Strong in the monthly publication of American Institute of Religious Science, "it will be a favorable time for the world to turn the last page and begin a new page of history," and he closes with a vision of universal and permanent peace through world organization. Albert Shaw, writing in the Review of Reviews, says: "The world will have created a higher authority as its substitute for the old. There must be a real federation of the world. It must be a peace union, with authority and power to enforce its just decrees. There must be neutralization of the high seas everywhere. Jurisdiction of the high seas should belong to higher world authorities. Sea power should be to no single nation." "We should like to see 1915," says the Congregationalist and Christian World, "definite steps taken toward a reorganization of international relationships so that in future all disputes between nations shall be settled, not a resort to arms, but by an appeal to the conscience of the world, as embodied in a properly constituted world-tribunal, supported if necessary by force, representing not one nation but all."

No movement for world-peace can succeed without divine help. We must look to God, first and last, for success. If the righteous in every civil land unite for peace, the miracle would come to pass. But the church must be true to its mission; it must strip itself of its impedimenta of disputes and differences; it must combine in a mighty effort, bend all its energies to lead men back to God and to the recognition of Jesus Christ as the Prince of Peace and the world's Saviour. Men's hearts and consciences must be awakened to the love of justice, righteousness and to obedience to the divine will. Any peace that is based on other foundation than this will be a delusion and a disappointment. God testing his church. Will it be found faithful and true?

Comment by the Way

—FIVE YEARS AGO E. A. EGGERS, now chairman of the Post Office of the New York Letter Carriers' Association, inaugurated the Sabbath Day rest movement for United States office employees. The movement resulted successfully. Now Eggers presents another problem on behalf of the postal employees and one equally deserving of serious consideration. He claims that the government sustains a loss of many millions annually owing to the inefficient services of aged employees, and that the first assistant postmaster general holds that all aged and inefficient men in the postal service should be dismissed. Mr. Eggers is now agitating in behalf of pensions for those who may be subject to removal from postal service in consequence of age or sickness.

—PRACTICALLY ALL THE EUROPEAN POWERS are coquetting with the Vatican, less with a view to the Pope's influence being exerted for peace, than for the purpose of checkmating other diplomatically. Meanwhile, Benedict XV and his secret of state, Cardinal Gasparri, are striving to observe a "impartiality." It is not easy to understand how the Papal office can be employed in behalf of peace. Should the champion the cause of the Allies, he will mortally offend Austria, his most loyal supporter; while if he should espouse the cause of the Dual Alliance, Catholic France will be outraged, to say nothing of Belgium. Meanwhile, England, for the first time in a hundred years, has sent an ambassador to the Vatican (as the protest of the English Protestant Alliance), for the purpose of looking after its interests and of counteracting the influence of Germany and Austria. Then if the Pope could not be persuaded to sanction the relation of one side with "heathen Rome" no more could he be expected to approve the other side's dealings with the "infidel Turk." Taken altogether, it is a peculiar tangle, quite as complicated as the war itself.

The BIBLE and NEWSPAPER

CONDUCTED BY
FERDINAND C. IGLEHART, D.D.

Intercession Day in Britain

THE first Sunday of the new year was observed as Intercession Day by all religious denominations throughout Great Britain. In the churches in France and Belgium, where circumstances permitted it, services were held. Heads of the Catholic and Protestant churches made addresses to their people to humbly plead with God for the close of the war and a lasting peace. Rev. Dr. Horton, the distinguished Congregational leader, said: "This day is the instruction demand of the heart of the country, out of the depths of its sorrow. It will be very largely an expression of penitence and contrition; but there is all intense anxiety about our men in danger, and the immense loss of life appeals to us all." In the prayer sent out to all the Anglican churches there appears this paragraph: "We shall have no desire to see our enemies crushed merely for the sake of their humiliation. We wish for them, as for ourselves, that their eyes may be opened to know what is true, and we pray that the day may come, by the mercy of God, when we may learn to understand and respect one another and may be joined as friends to pursue the common good." We have seen nothing so encouraging as this humility, penitence, brotherhood in intercession with God. Our God will turn a deaf ear to no nation that is on its knees with such prayer. That spirit, shared by all nations, would soon end the war. Intercession and Prayer Day was in accordance with this suggestion of the psalmist: "Pray for the peace of Jerusalem." (Ps. 122:6.)

Stalled by Hailstones

AN AVALANCHE of hailstones obstructed the tracks of the Pennsylvania Railroad from Pottsville beyond Richie, Pa., a distance of fourteen miles, recently. The hail rolling down the mountain was ground into fine particles and filled the track up with solid ice, so that it took a force as could be used ten or twelve hours of hard digging with picks and work with sharp shovels to open a way for the trains. Broadening is a sturdy, a perilous business. There is always danger that the cold will snap the steel rails, that the switch will be open, that the signal will be mistaken, that the heavy rains will wash away the ties and the bridges, that the snow and hail will obstruct the tracks. Every business has its barriers of some kind or other. It is so in the spiritual world as well. There are wrecking dangers to be avoided; there are deposits of hail on the track of the Christian that have to be dug out with pick and shovel. Worse than the hailstorm on the railroad track, where there was no loss of life, was the fatal one thus mentioned in the Bible: "They were more which died with hailstones than they whom the children of Israel slew with the sword." (Joshua 10:11.)

Alaskan Reindeer Civilizes Eskimos

IT WAS expected, when the reindeer was introduced into Alaska twenty years ago by the United States Government, that good would result. But the most enthusiastic friends of the project did not dream that in so short a time such an evolution in the civilization of the natives could be effected. The Federal Bureau of Education in its report makes a record of this marvelous progress in the thrift of the Alaskans. The educational system of Alaska is closely linked to the reindeer industry and in the northern and western parts of the territory school superintendents have charge of the reindeer service. This industry has given to the Eskimos not only food and clothing, but a means of transportation superior to dog-teams. Instead of being nomadic hunters, as they were, by the introduction of the new animal the Eskimos have become home-makers and farmers. They are not only self-supporting, but they are embracing the opportunity to save money by the sale of meat and skins to the white men. And thus the process of evolution goes on from the dog to the deer, from the chase to the farmer and herdsman in the frozen north, as it has been in more friendly climates and soils in a better type of civilization from the ox to the horse, the horse to steam, and steam to electricity. The deer meat the Alaskans are raising for market is a choice dish. It was so counted in olden times: "Now therefore take, I pray thee, thy weapons, thy quiver and thy bow, and go out to the field, and take me some venison." (Gen. 27:3.)

CHURCH BURNS ON CHRISTMAS DAY

THE West End Methodist Church of Montreal, Canada, was completely destroyed by fire on Christmas Day. The weather was intensely cold, the thermometer registering fifteen degrees below zero. The water from the firemen's hose turned to ice, and the building presented a fantastic ice figure in a frozen ruin. The elements as servants are benevolent friends; as masters they are terribly deadly enemies. Fire as a servant was warming the houses and bringing comfort and cheer to them on the glad day; as a master it swept away the beauty of architecture, and the solid masonry, mocking even so sacred a thing as God's home and its altar. All thought has its material expression. Love for God incarnates itself in a house for God. It was so in the Mosaic dispensation, it is so now in the Christian era. Love for God through faith in his crucified Son expresses itself in every Christian church building. The material building with its worship ministers to the affection that created it. It is the spiritual church that endures. If every church building on earth were to be consumed by fire today, other ones would be started as soon as the ashes could be cleared away for the foundations. The love for Christ will build a new church in Montreal, because that love can never be harmed by any outward circumstance. The indestructibility of this spiritual kingdom is thus declared: "Thy kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and thy dominion endureth throughout all generations." (Ps. 145:13.)

Kansas Sends Belgium Food

THE steamship Hannah sailed from New York, January 5, with $300,000 worth of food for the Belgian sufferers. The fund was gathered by a Kansas committee with ex-Governor Stubbs as the head. Ex-Congressman Scott, of Iowa, Kan., said: "This shipment of food represents the loose change of our people. The state is rich this year as the result of a great harvest that yielded about $2,000 for every family in the state; therefore it is easy for Kansas to give of her bounty, and she does so with a full heart, for never before has a cause so appealed to our state." There is this reference to a man who was helpless and was perishing for want of food: "He is like to die for hunger in the place where he is; for there is no more bread in the city." (Jer. 17:9.)

Governor Whitman's Inauguration

CHARLES SEYMOUR WHITMAN was formally inducted into office as the forty-fourth governor of the state of New York in a brilliant manner on January 1. The new executive was honored by one of the most magnificent military pageants that ever graced the inauguration of any governor at Albany. Two thousand national guardsmen marched before the new governor. One of the bands in the parade was the New York City Police Band. The carriage bearing Mr. Whitman and Mr. Glynn was escorted by Troop B. The assembly chamber where the inaugural exercises took place had been lavishly decorated with flags, bunting, flowers and potted plants with holly and evergreen. The secretary of state had charge of the exercises. First were ushered in judges of the Court of Appeals, members of the new senate and assembly, the military staffs of Governors Glynn and Whitman, in their brilliant trappings. Then Mr. Whitman and the ex-governor entered the chamber amid the cheers of the distinguished audience filling the room. After a few appropriate remarks by the retiring governor, Chief Justice Bartlett administered the oath of office to Governor Whitman, who then subscribed to the oath in the book for the purpose, and the pen with which the signature was made was presented to Mrs. Whitman, who, with her little daughter Olive, was on the platform. Governor Whitman then read his inaugural address, which was direct and specific in its references to civic problems. He promised an immediate rigid investigation of all departments of the state. He made a severe arraignment of the growing extravagance and waste in the past twenty years, giving the figures in municipal and state expenditures to justify his complaint. Perhaps the strangest part of his address was his mention of the shocking disregard of law and authority, and of the multiplication of crime as the result. There was in sacred history a hero who slew a giant champion of moral evil and was inaugurated as ruler of the nation. "And the men of Judah came, and there they anointed David king." (II Sam. 2:4.)

Powerful Locomotive

DURING the past year, a number of electrical passenger locomotives have been put into active service. They are the most powerful passenger engines in the world. They can haul sixteen steel Pullman cars at the rate of sixty miles an hour, and with a light load can make eighty-five miles an hour. All the wheels of the locomotive carry motors. These powerful machines are only the hint of the power of the Almighty, who made the iron, and the electric current, and the man to construct and run the engine, and the earth on which the track is laid. In his eloquent description of God's omnipotence Job says: "He stretcheth out the north over the empty place, and hangeth the earth upon nothing. The thunder of his power who can understand?" (Job 26:7, 11.)

Inebriate Farm's New Head

DR. CHARLES F. STOKES, former surgeon-general of the United States navy, has been appointed director of the New York City Inebriate Farm at Warwick, Orange County, by Mayor Mitchel. The farm was intended to be used principally as a cure for alcoholism, but the victims of cocaine, heroin, opium and kindred drugs are so numerous that the attempt will be made to treat and cure them too. It is beautiful for society to cure the victims of evil habit, but it ought to better safeguard the weak against temptation, and the followers of Christ should so live and teach that the weak and wayward might be lifted up by love, and the individual hearts, especially of the young, might be so purified by faith that they might form characters that would not need to be reformed. No one is so low down but that he or she may realize the truth of these words: "Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool." (Isa. 1:18.)

WILL THERE BE A "HOLY WAR"

WHEN it was announced by the cables, a few weeks ago, that the Sheik-ul-Islam, the head of the Moslem Church, had officially proclaimed a jihad, or "holy war," an element was injected into the great conflict now progressing in Europe and the Near East, which in former ages has many times caused the whole Christian world to shudder with apprehension. It is only too true, as the history of Mohammedanism shows, that the propagation of Islam by the jihad has been, in the past, one of the most potential means of extending the Moslem conquests and of establishing the religion of the Prophet in many lands. In the Koran the "holy war" is enjoined as a religious duty in dealing with an "infidel" country which it is desired to conquer, and in earlier times the ruthless treatment of many unfortunate peoples, who were overcome by the jihad, showed what frightful cruelties could be perpetrated by a fanatical race in the name of religion.

But the "holy war" no longer has the power to affright Christendom. No more can it be asserted that the followers of the prophet are a unit in their opposition to other religions. They interpret the Koran as their forefathers did, but they realize that it provides for the spread of Mohammedanism by peaceful persuasion and example as well as by force, and they choose the latter method as more liable to be successful. Besides, the scales have turned in the passing centuries. The forces of Christendom, united, would represent over 564,000,000 souls. The 240,000,000 Mohammedans, scattered as they are in many lands—170,000,000 in Asia, 8,500,000 in Europe, 65,000,000 in Africa and many distributed through different sections of North and South America and Oceania—are so situated geographically that a jihad would be ineffective as a whole, even while it might be attempted in certain parts of the Moslem world.

Fortunately for the world's peace there seems to be little danger of any holy war on an extensive scale. The news of its proclamation, however, has been spread throughout Eastern Europe, Asia Minor, Syria and the adjoining countries, and Christian refugees are fleeing from the interior to the coast, where they can hope for protection. In Europe the proclamation of the holy war has been made by Turkey against Serbia and her allies. There is thus far no evidence of a Moslem uprising in India, which has a large Mohammedan population. In North Africa, where the prophet's followers are numerous, there are signs of unwonted activity, but whether it will attain the proportions of a general movement cannot yet be determined.

In an article on the subject, communicated to the Christian Herald, Mr. Eugene Parsons gives these enlightening facts concerning the situation:

"Does the entrance of Turkey into the conflict between Germany and the Allies mean a Moslem holy war? This is a time of actual and impending transition in the Ottoman empire. The Turk is in desperate straits. It looks as if he would be driven out of Europe, unless he can get the help of Islamic hosts in Africa and Asia to stave off the evil day.

"The Sultan of Turkey is the caliph of Islam. As the successor of Mohammed, he is the head of the faith, and he may call upon Mussulmans their wealth and their lands as booty to the Moslems, O Lord of all creatures!

"The 'infidels' here referred to are those who do not accept the teachings of Mohammed. Such sayings as 'Giaour's neck is for the sword of Islam' and 'Giaour's property is lawful to Moslem' are often heard in Mohammedan countries.

to come to the rescue. In other words, he may summon the Mohammedan hordes of Asia and Africa to invade Europe again. A crusade of fanatical Moslems might be stirred up by 'mad mullahs,' and a vast deal of harm might result.

"It is well for us to understand that a deep gulf separates Islam and Christianity. Mohammedans do not admit the superiority of Western civilization. To them, the Koran is all and in all that is really valuable in culture. In Mussulman countries, personal rights, such as bearing arms and testifying in courts, exist only for the true followers of the prophet. 'Peace be unto you' are the words of salutation among Moslems, but they are never addressed to a Christian.

"The attitude of Mohammedans toward Christians is seen in the prayers in the Koran. Here is one:

I seek refuge with Allah from Satan (the rejeen), the accursed. In the name of Allah, the compassionate, the merciful! O Lord of all creatures! O Allah! Destroy the infidels and polytheists, thine enemies, the enemies of thy religion! O Allah! Make their children orphans, and defile their abodes; cause their feet to slip; give them and their families, their households and their women, their children and their relatives by marriage, their brothers and their friends, their possessions and their race,

"Historians tell us that Islam made slow progress at first, and the impatient Mohammed started his followers on a career of conquest, promising paradise to those who fell in 'sacred warfare.' The hearts of Mussulmans still vibrate at the thought of dying for the faith. Death in such a cause opens to them the gates of a sensual heaven, where they are welcomed by smiling, beautiful houris to the fullest bliss.

Fired with this hope, success in this life or happiness in paradise, the Moslem tribe after tribe. They obeyed the terrible mandate of the Koran: 'O true believers! wage war against such of the infidels as are near you and let them find severity in you, and know that God is with them that fear him.'

"Unbelievers had their choice of the Koran, tribute, or death. Within a century from the death of Mohammed, his followers had extended the dominions of Islam as far as India and Spain. The Arabs, or Saracens (as they are sometimes called), subjugated many nations, but their progress northward into France was checked by Charles Martel in one of the decisive battles of history, in the year 732. Later the Turks, migrating from Tartary into Armenia, fell in with the Saracens and were converted to Islam. After centuries of fighting in Asia, Turks invaded Europe. The Ottomans took Adrianople in 1365 and Constantinople in 1453. They pressed on northward toward central Europe, but were repulsed before the gates of Vienna in 1529. From that time to this, banner of the Prophet has been a menace to Christian Europe. For more than thirteen centuries the sword of the Koran have gone together. A religious motive was the pretext of the expeditions and wars of the Saracens and Turks. What more natural than that this Moslem propaganda should again take shape in a 'holy war'?

"It is asserted that the Sultan of Turkey is in correspondence with Mohammedans of Afghanistan, Persia, India and other countries of Asia and Africa. Could he by the mere proclamation of a 'holy war' throw Moslem dominions into convulsion? His is the supreme authority in religion, but not in secular matters. He has to reckon with public opinion, and this may not sanction an attack on Christian nations. Abdul Hamid, the Sultan, was never able to start widespread revolt of the faith against Christians.

"There are two other great Mohammedan rulers besides the Sultan, viz. the Sheik-ul-Islam in Cairo, who is practically the pope of the orthodox Mohammedans; and the head of the secret order of the Senussiyah, who are the old-fashioned wing of Islam. These two spiritual princes have mighty influence in the Mohammedan world, and, while hostile to 'infidels,' they presumably will go along in advising the Moslem populations to take up arms as defenders of the faith. True, they are both bigots. At the same time, they are educated men. They know the strength of the enemy, and this knowledge may cause them to think twice before letting loose the wild Bedouins of the desert upon defenseless Christian women and armed Christian men.

"The present Sultan of Turkey is not so despotic as his predecessor. The caliph of Islam, he is in a sense a preme, but his word is not necessarily law with the followers of the prophet for the Sheik-ul-Islam may choose to release them from allegiance to the Sultan in this matter, despite the fact that the Sultan is the head of the religion. But, if his co-religionists fall in with the idea, then the military forces of the Ottomans will greatly augmented.

"There is no telling what fanaticism will do. We shall soon see whether the threatened 'holy war' is a reality or not. If it turn out to be a terrible reality, then we may expect to read more Armenian massacres and of risings against Christians in other parts of the Levant.

"The claim has been made by apologists for the Moslems of Asia Minor that they are not so intolerant to Christians as is commonly supposed. Americans will await developments with the deepest interest and anxiety. The fact that American missionaries have been asked by our consuls to leave Turkey is significant."

ALIEN LABOR PROTECTED BY CONSTITUTION. A special Federal District Court sitting at San Francisco to review an injunction restraining the state of Arizona from enforcing its recently adopted anti-alien employment act, declared that act unconstitutional, January 7, and made the injunction permanent. The court's argument was that the Supreme Court of the United States has held that the right to labor is a right of property; and an alien cannot be deprived of the right of property under our constitution. Foreign diplomats, especially those of England, Italy and Japan, have been openly concerned about the Arizona law. The decision may be appealed to the Supreme Court.

WHO WILL PAY THE PIPER? Some dozen years ago a nation-wide boycott of D. E. Loewe & Co., hatters of Danbury, Conn., was carried merrily on by striking workmen and their sympathizers, because the firm refused to unionize its shops. The famous "Danbury hatters' case" resulted, the firm suing for damages, and court after court has considered the evidence and the law in the matter. The litigation as to the illegality of the boycott has now been forever settled by decision of the Supreme Court, which holds that 186 Connecticut labor union members are liable for the $252,130.09 damages awarded under the Sherman anti-trust law. The real and personal property of these men has already been attached, but they claim that they in turn can hold the United Hatters of North America and the American Federation of Labor liable for the huge bill, and this somewhat latitudinarian view has aroused no little debate among labor leaders attached to the respective organizations and to others. So possibly the Danbury Hatters' case is not even yet disposed of.

SAFETY-FIRST MOVEMENT STIMULATED IN NEW YORK. A quarter of a million people on their way to work on the morning of January 6 were delayed for hours and caused enormous inconvenience, and worse still by far, one woman was killed and over 200 injured through panic, all due to a short circuit in the electric current that operates the subway. The short circuiting of the current threw the tunnel and the trains into darkness and started the insulating material, composed largely of rubber, tar and resin products, burning. Three overcrowded trains were first stalled just beyond the flames, then presently the whole system was disorganized. When the smoke and deadly fumes began to penetrate the cars the passengers were seized with panic, and terrible scenes resulted from their efforts to escape and make their way to the upper air. It is regarded as extraordinary that so few perished. Ambulances from all parts of the city were hurried to the scene, and private automobiles were pressed into service to remove the victims of the fumes, among whom were many of the firemen who had arrived with their apparatus. The subway was not in normal condition until one o'clock the following morning. An investigation of the disaster is under way and steps to make the equipment of the subway fireproof and otherwise safer for the public are also being taken. The fire was so intense that thick coils of four-inch cables were destroyed and asbestos-lined steel manhole doors were cracked.

City Railroad Company and some twenty-five vestibule cars, besides a nearby lumber-yard, were destroyed; a dozen persons were seriously hurt, and over one hundred firemen were overcome by the smoke. It required the services of eighteen local fire companies aided by apparatus and fire boats from Philadelphia to subdue the flames, which were fanned by a north wind. Thousands of spectators watched the spectacle.

CONGRESS TAKES UP WORLD-PEACE. On January 2, Hon. Charles F. Curry of California introduced in the House of Representatives the first measure ever placed before an American Congress in the interest of world-peace. It was in the form of a joint resolution which reads as follows:

JOINT RESOLUTION

"Authorizing and empowering the President to invite all nations to send delegates to a convention to provide for disarmament, for the creation of an international legislature, an international court, an international army and navy police, and for other purposes.

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to invite all nations to send accredited delegates to an international convention to frame a constitution for submission to the nations for ratification, said constitution among other things to provide for an international legislature to enact laws for the government of the intercourse between nations; to provide for an international court to adjudicate the differences between nations; to provide for the disarmament of all nations; to provide for an international army and navy to be used as international police and when so ordered to enforce the decrees of the international court; to provide that each nation shall be protected in its right to retain and maintain its own form of government and to exercise exclusive authority over its internal affairs; and to provide further that each nation shall only be permitted to maintain an army and navy sufficiently large to police its own territory."

On January 5 the same resolution was introduced in the Senate by Hon. Robert L. Owen of Oklahoma. The resolution has been referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and ordered printed. It is the outcome of a widespread agitation of the peace movement and of memorials, circulated by the Christian Herald, which have been numerous signed and mailed to members of both Houses and the President within the last few weeks.

WAR'S EFFECT ON TRADE REPORT. By the annual report of the British Board of Trade on January 7 we learn that that country has suffered a loss of $475,000,000 in exports, of course accumulating since the beginning of the war, and her imports fell off $355,000,000 for 1914 as against 1913. The exports in which the heaviest cuts have been made are coal, and iron and steel and cotton manufactured goods.

SELF-HELP ADVOCATED FOR MERCHANT MARINE. The ancient problem of government subsidies as a help to the development of our merchant class of vessels is being fought out all over again in Congress and out, and the administration program for the creation of a merchant marine under government ownership or control to meet present abnormal conditions of foreign trade is meeting with some determined opposition. A special committee of the New York Chamber of Commerce has declared against direct government aid. The Alexander bill in the House calls for the creation of a federal merchant marine fleet.

SOUTH SEES BETTER PROSPECTS. With sixty-seven steamers booked to sail from Galveston between now and March 31 loaded with cotton for European consignees, and Russian buyers here looking for 50,000 bales, not to mention the use of cotton goods exclusively for their graduation gowns by girls of a New York high school, belief may be expressed that the cotton growers of the south have justified the administration's expectation that they would manage nicely without that $250,000,000 of federal money. Some readers of the Christian Herald have taken exception to our news paragraph on the latter phase of the cotton situation under the title "Uncle Sam Refuses to be a Hen," but they inadvertently overlook that while we have stated what seemed to be the views of the majority of Congress on that point, we also have given space and an illustration to commending the national movement for the relief of the hard-hit industry.

RUSSIA'S NEW LEAF STAYS TURNED OVER. In the face of enormous influence brought to bear by the liquor and allied interests to obtain a modification of the government's ban on alcoholic drinks in favor of beers and light wines, the councils of the cities, to whom had been reserved the right to appeal for such a modification, rejected the petitions, and now prohibition is complete, extending, it is said, even to denatured alcohol, varnishes and other alcoholic compounds; special permits are required for the sale of such commodities.

EGYPT CHANGES HANDS. It was announced by the British Government the latter part of December that "in view of the state of war arising out of the action of Turkey, Egypt is placed under the protection of his Majesty, and will henceforth constitute a British protectorate. The suzerainty of Turkey over Egypt is thus terminated." As a direct consequence of this move, Abbas Hilmi Pasha was deposed as Khedive of Egypt and Prince Hussein Kamel Pasha, the eldest living prince of the family of Mehemet Ali and uncle of the former khedive, was made sultan of Egypt.

EGYPT'S NEW SULTAN

MOTHER EARTH RESENTS BEING CUT. There is so much movement of rock and soil into the Panama Canal basin, caused by the enormous pressure along the sides, that dredges must be continually employed to keep clear the channel; Colonel Goethals fears that battleships will be unable to pass through in connection with the formal opening in March, and the President and other distinguished guests may have to skirt the slides via railway in order to continue their historic voyage to San Francisco.

DEATH A GOOD BUYER. Among the munitions of war which, it is claimed, are being purchased in vast quantities in this country by the belligerents of Europe is the aerial arrow, a pointed steel pencil with grooved sides that act as a stabilizer in the downward flight of this instrument, which, dropped from aircraft, by its terrific momentum becomes red hot, and, striking its victim with bullet velocity, pierces through helmet and man to the ground, and even through man and horse. An order for a great quantity of these terrible missiles has lately been refused by an American firm, according to the press, but it is currently understood that the French have been able to procure all they wish from makers here.

BUT THEY WON'T TURN OUT FOR IT! A headline in a New York daily of January 9 states that "Auto Makers See Prosperity Ahead." With reckless abandon the industry drives straight on into this condition which is so apparent to it in the road, and consequently cannot justly complain if it finds itself stalled in a mire of money. In fact some makers already complain that their entire product for 1915 has been contracted for, the annual automobile show, which closed in New York on January 9 and then opened in Chicago, having had much to do with this situation. The show was declared the most successful in the history of the industry; and in the opinion of the National Automobile Chamber of Commerce is a reliable indication of vastly improved business conditions in this country close at hand.

Questions and Answers

Mrs. H. S., Cincinnati, Ohio. Is the day of miracles past? Is anything too hard or impossible for God? Would Christ today heal our physical bodies as he did in olden times if we had faith?

The day of miracles is not past. The question "Is anything too hard, or impossible, for God?" is apt to be misleading. While it is true that nothing is impossible for God, yet it is also true that God seems always to work according to method, or law. When the flying machine was invented, no laws of gravity were uperced; they were simply recombined with other laws, just as the magnet seems to break away, but does not. So with radium; it appears to break and change other principles, but in reality only readjusts and reapplies them. In his miracles Christ made use of a new power, but did not set aside the laws of the universe. The case you mention would seem to be one of those outside the sphere of God's miraculous activity. We never hear of a lost limb or member being made to grow again. Christ restored the ear of the high priest's servant not, doubtless, by making another ear grow, but by rejoining the severed member to its place—a thing which surgeons now occasionally do in their regular practice. An eye injured in the manner you mention could probably not be restored to normal condition, any more than if the eye had been lost another could be made to grow in its place. But foreign growths have been removed; arms dislocated; weak organs strengthened by Christ's miraculous power in response to the prayer of faith. And, while not neglecting any human skill or aid or material means, we should be constantly expecting from God greater things rather than less, and may come to find that even things we had called impossible are after all included in his plan.

Reader, Moores Hill, Ind. Cannot a person be a thorough Bible scholar and yet not a Christian, or must a person be a Christian to be a good Bible scholar?

We have to distinguish between knowing what is in the Bible and knowing what its contents really mean. One might be a good Bible scholar, an eminent Bible scholar, in the sense of knowing what is in the Bible, and yet have a very imperfect or erroneous comprehension of what the Bible really means. The first kind of knowledge of the Scripture is possible to an unconverted man; the second kind is not. Paul is sinking of this when he says: "The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness unto him, neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned." (1 Cor. 2: 14.) And "What man knoweth the things of a man, save the spirit of an which is in him? Even so the things of God knoweth no man, but the Spirit of God." (Verse 11.)

E. M., Cornwallis, Ore. writes: "Some time ago I came across this in Mechanism in thought, but Not in Morals, by Oliver Wendell Holmes: 'The divine foreknowledge is no more the way of man's free agency than is the vine omnipotence in the way of man's free action. Surely the Infinite can slip the cable of the finite, if he choose so to do.' Certainly, I thought I, although God is all-powerful, that does not prevent my chopping my wood and crying it in. The power I have is but a portion of his, lent me for the present. Neither does his omniscience, his foreknowledge, prevent my freedom of choice. The knowledge I have is but lent me. I can use it as I please and then take the consequences. So with you, for me, I am determined to do right. Will you do the same? The Lord help us. He will, we believe in him and are faithful to him."

R. C., Shelbyville, Tenn. Can a true Christian wilfully sin?

This question usually revolves about the passage: "Whoever is born of God doth not commit sin; for his seed remaineth in him; and he cannot sin, because he is born of God." (1 John 9.) As we have stated many times in the Mail-Bag, the whole volume of Scripture must be taken together in answering any question. Now the whole message of the Bible seems to be built upon the assumption that it is possible for any one to sin. The temptation of Christ seems to imply even he could have yielded; herwise temptation would have no meaning. Paul said he was conscious of the possibility of coming "a castaway." (1 Cor. 9: 27.) While this passage from John is extremely difficult, it may, perhaps interpret it in this way—that while a person is loving God he cannot sin. The one must drop out of his consciousness first. Righteousness means the desire and effort to obey God; so that while we are loving him we are not sinning. Sin is "a wilful transgression of a known law"; and God does not account an act sinful when we do it believing that it has his approval. The way to keep from sinning is to keep this love for God ever present in our consciousness. While we have it our deeds will not be sinful. But we may at any time put it away, or allow ourselves to lose it, and then we shall yield to sin. A wilful sin means that one sins, saying: "I know that God does not wish me to do this, but I am going to do it." And certainly it is not an extravagance of language to say that while one is conscious of loving God he cannot say that.

Mrs. W. B. J., Irving, N. Y. According to many Biblical authorities Eden, described in Gen. 2: 8-10, was located in that region of Asia in the neighborhood of the Euphrates, and not far from the supposed site of Babylon. There are, however, several other regions indicated as the probable site of Eden. These include Armenia, the country near the Caspian Sea, the region of the Oxus, Cashmere in upper India, Ceylon, etc. Many attempts have been made to identify various rivers with those mentioned in the story in Genesis. Probably the preponderance of scholarship points to that section where the Euphrates and Tigris unite. 2. Sodom and Gomorrah were two of the "cities of the plain," situated in or near the vale of Siddim (Gen. 10: 19), which were overwhelmed by the destruction described in Gen. 19: 24-28.

Miscellaneous

E. K., Cincinnati, Ohio. Your suggestion is a novel one, but it is better not to mix the emblems of church and state.

Mrs. S. L. C., Dawn, Mo. Your suggestion to your Sunday school class that, amid the outflow of national generosity to Europe, we should not forget the suffering and starving in our own land, is both timely and practical.

A. H. S., Wilkesbarre, Pa. The responsibility for the European war is still an open question. You are, however, sound in your assumption that if the nations had been truly Christian, there would have been no war.

C. R. C., Shelbyville, Tenn. "S. O. S." stands for "Suspend other service." It is the wireless signal, indicating a last despairing call for help from a vessel sinking at sea, and is equivalent to "Leave everything and come and help us." 2. We cannot answer your other question.

R. A. G., Irving, N. Y. The war in Mexico has unquestionably produced a great deal of suffering in that country, but conditions there are such that any attempt to help would be impracticable. Our people have rendered help to the thousands of refugees along the border.

Mrs. M. H. G., West Farmington, Ohio. "God reigns and the government at Washington still stands," were the concluding words of a speech delivered in New York by General Garfield on the night of April 15, 1865, the day on which Lincoln was shot.

J. E. N., Dyberry, Pa. 1. For several years we have heard nothing of the evangelist you name. We believe he has quit the evangelistic field. 2. Don't know the books mentioned. 3. There are no means of comparing the two evils mentioned. Both are irredeemably bad.

E. H., Thornton, Iowa. The black pearl is obtained from the pearl-oyster of the Gulf of Mexico. It is small, of a brilliant luster, and on account of its scarcity commands a higher price than the ordinary whitish or yellowish pearl of the same size. Five hundred dollars has been paid for an ordinary sized specimen.

A. L. W., Chicago, Ill. 1. The quotation is a familiar one, and you will find it in any edition of Burns's poems in the public library. The correct quotation is:

"O wad some power the giftie gie us
To see ourselves as ithers see us."

2. The quotation from Murtach's collection of ballads is:

"Fine pictures suit in frames as fine;
Consistencie's a jewel."

C. F. J., Alpena, Mich. In the passage in 1 Cor. 2: 6 (first clause) Paul, in speaking of those who are "perfect," referred to those mature in Christian experience and knowledge, and who were consequently capable of understanding the true superiority of the Christian wisdom over the heathen. Not the new convert but the experienced Christian could realize the unfolding of its rich treasures of knowledge. He does not refer to absolute perfection, but to a comparative degree of ripeness in Christian growth.

C. R. C., Shelbyville, Tenn. In John 3: 5 the words "born of water and the Spirit" carried a two-fold explanation of the "new birth" which Nicodemus found so difficult to understand. As a Jew he was familiar with the symbolical application of water, and this language was designed to show him that the thing was no other than a thorough spiritual purification by the application of the Holy Ghost. (See Ezek. 36: 25-27.) The Christian church was soon to become the visible door of entrance to the "kingdom" through the agency of the Holy Spirit.

Beech-Nut Tomato Catsup

AS you know, the sooner a tomato is cooked after picking, the finer the flavor.

We selected Rochester as the place for our Catsup plant because the finest tomatoes in the world grow there.

The full, ripe flavor of the tomato is exceedingly delicate.

JUDGES 13: 8-16, 24, 25

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By Rev. F. B. Meyer, D.D.

"Beware, I pray thee, and drink not wine nor strong drink." Judges 13: 4.

The vow of the Nazarite was often taken for a limited period, of days or weeks. In this case it was to be for life, and therefore the co-operation of the mother was desirable and necessary. One feature of the vow was abstinence from wine and strong drink, and the angel was anticipating the findings of the most recent medical science when he forbade the mother to eat anything that came of the grape-vine or to drink strong drink. Of course she refrained! But, alas, how many parents and others are amongst us today who point blank refuse to abstain from self-indulgence, though their children's well-being is in the balance! The fashionable dance, the game of chance, the worldly set, are the intoxicating cup which young parents refuse to abstain from, though it cost their child's soul, partly because the nursery is left under an irresponsible nurse-girl, and partly because, as the boys and girls grow older, they imbibe through eye and ear influences that hurt. For the sake of the younger and weaker ones, let us abstain from abetting evil, and especially let us seek our exhilaration not from wine wherein is riot, but from the Holy Spirit, in whom is love, joy, self-control, and strength.

"The Child That Should Be Born"

By Amos R. Wells

THE Bible is a book of great prayers, but hardly in all its pages is there a greater prayer than Manoh's. He asked the Lord to send the angel again "to teach us what we shall do unto the child that shall be born." The time to plan for a child's training is before the child comes into the world. Two years ago, when the German Emperor became aroused on the subject of temperance, he learned that 60 per cent. of the insane in Germany, 52 per cent. of the epileptics and 46 per cent. of the criminals are children of drunken parents! A vast amount of misery would be saved if all parents should remember that their sin is sure to be visited upon their children, in sickness, shame, wicked inclinations and death.

When the angel came, Manoh asked him the wise question, "How shall we order the child?" One of the most painful scenes ever witnessed in a courtroom was enacted in England about a year ago when a mother, the witness of the murder, was compelled to testify against her son, who came home drunk and started to beat his wife. The mother's other son interfered and was stabbed in the throat by his brother. What mother, what father, with a little turn in life's wheel, but might be in the awful plight of that stricken witness? It was a sensible old farmer who, arguing with a lawyer on temperance, at last said, "Well, I have seven good reasons for voting for prohibition." "What are they?" "Four sons and three daughters."

When the angel forbade Manoh's wife, the mother of the coming Samson, to drink wine and strong drink, he laid down a fundamental principle of wisdom and strength. Ruin lurks in alcoholic liquors of all kinds and often where it is least expected. As I write, sixteen men in one Vermont town have just died from drinking liquor made of wood alcohol, furnished by a rascally druggist, and twenty more are sick. "There's death in the glass"—not always swift death like that, but always sure death.

Manoh's wife was also told to "observe all that the angel commanded her." Temperance carries with it the observance of the whole law. The great war had one fine effect in England—the saloons were compelled to keep open a smaller number of hours, and as a result, as one justice said, there was a swift falling off of thirty per cent. in the amount of crime. Alcohol is a universal law-breaker.

Then when Samson was born we have the significant words, "The child grew, and the Lord blessed him." He inherited the temperance blessing, and was himself under the total-abstinence vow. Such a blessing has come to the sons of Russia, as an unexpected result of the great war. Through the influence of Michael Tchelischeff, a peasant who became a millionaire, the Russian government has given up its monopoly of the production of vodka, the terrible national drink, almost pure alcohol. Of this vodka the Russians consumed $1,000,000,000 worth every year, and the government obtained from it $500,000,000 revenue. But already the improvement in the health of the Russians is so great and their savings-bank accounts are increasing so fast that this revenue loss is a manifest gain, while a New York life insurance actuary calculates that a Russian loss of 500,000 men in the war would be made good in less than ten years by total abstinence. Indeed, the Lord blesses the temperate life, as he blessed Samson.

"The Spirit of the Lord began to move" Samson, we read. The Spirit of the Lord cannot move one in whom the spirit of alcohol moves. Neal Dow was lecturing on a summer evening, and was annoyed by the beetles, gnats and other insects that gathered around a near-by lamp. He flitted them away with his handkerchief, but they kept returning. At last he blew out the lamp, and so ended the plague. That is the way to end the plague of rum. It is not enough to warn men away from the saloon; you must extinguish the abominable traffic in liquor.

It is a thousand pities that the life of Samson, so closely bound in one way to the temperance principle, should have come to grief through another intemperance than that in strong drink. He became the slave of licentiousness, the passion to which in our modern days the saloon directly ministers. Thus Samson, Delilah's fool, became spiritually blind before the Philistines put out his eyes. He died as became a Hebrew hero; would that he had lived more like one! Samson is an illustration of the need of thorough-going temperance—temperance that reaches the heart and purifies the inward fountain of thought and action.

Samson, the Disappointment

By Arthur H. Howland

IT HAS been pointed out that the stories related of Samson in the book of Judges hardly seem to coincide with the serious statement that he judged Israel for twenty years and with the earnest announcement of the heavenly messenger before his birth that he was to be the divinely appointed instrument of God to begin the deliverance of Israel from the hand of her enemies. But you will notice that these narratives are chiefly of the early youth of Samson and again of the closing days of his life. Between those youthful exploits and the sad close of his career there were doubtless years of wise and sober leadership. One writer has pointed out that to judge Samson by his early adventures would be like judging a great statesman by some of his college pranks. Yet, after all, the story of Samson is disappointing. It carries out ruthlessly the Bible plan of telling not only the good but the evil in the lives of its characters. From the heavenly

Yes, Resinol Soap certainly has cleared my skin

If you want a clear, fresh, glowing complexion, use Resinol Soap at least once a day. Work a warm, creamy lather of it well into the pores, then rinse the face with plenty of cold water.

It does not take many days of such regular care with Resinol Soap to show an improvement, because the Resinol medication soothes and refreshes the skin, while the pure soap, free from alkali, is cleansing it. The same treatment does wonders for the hands, arms and neck.

When the skin is in a very neglected condition, with pimples, blackheads, redness or roughness, spread on just a little Resinol Ointment for ten or fifteen minutes before using Resinol Soap.

Resinol Soap is not artificially colored, its rich brown tint being entirely due to the Resinol medication it contains. Twenty-five cents at all druggists and dealers in toilet goods. For a guestroom size trial cake, write Dept. 24-C, Resinol, Baltimore, Md.

announcement of his birth and the careful preparations that were made for his coming into the world; from the piety and thoughtfulness and self-control of his parents; from the advantages of his boyhood, indicated by the words: "And the child grew and the Lord blessed him," and still more emphatically, "The Spirit of the Lord began to move him," we should certainly expect a far cleaner record of Samson's life than the Scriptures show.

But it has also been pointed out by Bible scholars that Samson must be judged not by the standards of morality prevailing in our day, but by those prevailing in his own. According to these standards he had a certain nobleness of character accompanying his great strength. His attacks upon his enemies, while apparently prompted by the spirit of personal revenge, may have helped, after all, in the delivering of the Israelites from their oppressors. They themselves had been subjected many times to the same kind of raids which Samson made upon the Philistines. In the second instance Samson had strong cause for resentment, because his wife had been given, in his absence, to another man who had been his own companion and friend. This in itself is an intimation of the low moral state of the times, though of course in this particular instance the morals of the Philistines and not the Israelites were involved, for he had married a young Philistine woman. In the third instance he seems to have acted entirely in self-defense. And although he was bound by his fearful neighbors, who plotted to deliver him to his enemies, he was so miraculously aided that he broke the bonds and worsted his foes.

There is a special fitness in regarding the story of Samson as a temperance lesson. The advice given to the mother of Samson before his birth is in harmony with the very latest science, because it has been found that children of mothers who drink liquor, even in moderation, have a strong tendency to become victims of alcoholism. Samson was pledged from his birth to be a total abstainer; and the enemies he overthrew, both beast and man, and that finally overthrew him, are very like the enemy which comes to tempt us in the guise of drink. It was the roar of a lion, then the attacks of men and lastly the pleadings of a woman that sought to conquer the Lord's giant. So, like a lion and like strong men and even like a delicate woman, the evil of strong drink may attack and lure us. There is only one safe standard, that which Gough uttered just as death stilled his clarion voice: "Young man, keep your record clean."

The total abstainer is no longer ridiculed or even questioned. The young people of our Sunday schools are to be congratulated because they are growing up in the magnificently victorious days of temperance reform. We are at the beginning of the end of the struggle. And it is now probable that before the little people of our primary departments reach the senior grades this country will be what the temperance forces have set out to make it, A Saloonless Nation.

One earnest question forces itself upon every student of this lesson: "Is any life to be a disappointment, as Samson's was?" Ponder deeply that brave personal message of Paul's, sent through the Colossian Church: "And say to Archippus, Take heed to the ministry which thou hast received in the Lord, that thou fulfil it."

Echoes from the Holy Land

By Rev. Franklin E. Hoskins, D.D.
Member of Syria Mission

THAT class of commentators who spent much labor and ingenuity in attempting to transform the story of Samson into a sun myth or a modified Hercules have missed the whole meaning of the narrative.

Samson is a border hero and border warfare in all lands and ages has produced prodigious specimens of humanity. The fragment of the Danites who found a temporary home within the borders of the Philistines suffered greatly from their ancient hereditary enemies. The story of Samson is intensely human in every particular. This land is still abundant in shrines frequented by childless women who pour out prayers and register vows in their intense longings for children. God does hear such prayers and vows.

Samson, like many another, was a spoiled child. He fancied a maiden from among his hereditary enemies, the Philistines, and indulging in the rude customs of that time with his riddle caused the death of the whole family. Then in his disappointment he turned toward a still more questionable woman of Gaza and the remainder of his story is that of his fall and his death. The strongest man in the world is powerless when in the grip of any sin.

The valley of Soreh, once so far away in time and place, has suddenly come near to us as the modern road from Jaffa to Jerusalem, for up the valley now runs the railroad, and "Samson's cavern" lies along the line, and names once almost lost, for most people, in the book of Judges are found on the railroad time-tables and called out when the train stops.

I know a man not far from Samson's country who loved a maiden outside his own people and district. When he went to see her he had to take other horsemen with him lest the young men of the maiden's town should resent his visits, according to the rude customs of the countryside, and play their tricks upon him and his father. When the day came to claim his bride the father and bridegroom were obliged, according to the customs, to surfeit the whole town with feasts of food, and camel loads of rice and native butter were consumed in the process. Then followed feats of physical strength in which the bridegroom and his friends were forced to prove their superiority before they could secure the bride and carry her outside her native town.

A Million Testaments

A Million Nickels from a Million Scholars for a Million Testaments for a Million Soldiers

THE nickels for Testaments are rolling in most encouragingly, and thousands of the souvenir bookmark receipts are going out daily to the contributors, but there are still many schools to be heard from (perhaps yours is one of them), and "it's a long, long way to" a million. Superintendents are urged to take up the matter with their schools without delay.

Many interesting notes from children show how strongly the movement has appealed to them. Hon John Wanamaker, who is a member of the executive committee of the World's Sunday School Association, received a note printed by hand with a pencil, after the fashion of a child who has not yet learned to write and to whom spelling is still a mystery: "Mr. Wanamaker My babie sister cant go Sunday skool so i giv you 5 cts. 4 her 2 git bibal fir soljers. (Signed) Lottie Kidder." In her letter was ten cents, a nickel for herself and another for her baby sister.

But this Million Testament Movement is by no means merely a small children's affair. Older scholars and officers and teachers, as well as adults who have no relation to the Sunday school, are asking a share in the work. A letter from New Bedford, Mass., in which a dollar was enclosed to purchase twenty Testaments for the soldiers at the front, closed with this sentence: "This is from a nurse, who, though unable to go herself, wants to help send the Gospel to the soldiers."

Write to Mr. Frank L. Brown, general secretary, World's Sunday School Association, Metropolitan Tower, New York City, for enough bookmark receipts for your school, and make remittances to cover the nickels you collect to Mr. Arthur M. Harris, treasurer, at the same address.

MAN-EATING TIGERS OF SIAM

"TIGERS have become so numerous and bold here," writes Mrs. Sarah Wirt Peoples, a missionary of Nani, Siam, that people from the villages have to travel in companies and carry guns when leaving their homes. Just across the river from the Presbyterian Mission an Indian dairyman, who supplies us with milk, has had three cows killed by a family of tigers, who have made a lair in the ruins of an ancient temple back of his place. They killed and ate a man who ventured too near. Twelve miles southwest of the city a boy was sleeping on the porch of the Buddhist temple at night. A large tiger sprang up and dragged him off into the jungle, where he was found next day, half eaten. Leopards have entered the mission boys' school yard several times lately and carried off dogs and chickens. A bullock was attacked in the street in front, but the noise of the rescuers frightened the tiger away.

"A farmer had taken his family out to live in the lodge in his upland rice-field, as is necessary after the rice is planted; otherwise deer and other wild animals will eat the rice. The mother had gone to sleep with her five-months-old babe in her arms, when a tiger tore the child from her. They followed the tracks with torches, but only overtook the tiger at daybreak, when he was seen to be playing with the dead child as a cat plays with a mouse. The little baby was rescued and buried.

Two other children have been attacked and mauled, but escaped and are still living.

"The Christian Herald continues to cheer our home and the homes of our two colleagues; then our English-speaking school teachers and hospital assistants read it and enjoy its beautiful pictures, and the covers are eagerly asked for. Now there is scarcely a Christian home the walls of which are not brightened by the covers."

The Babe of the Nile

WAVES of the Nile, roll gently,
In rhythmic flow;
Softly, ye winds of morning,
Caressing blow;
There in the shadow hidden,
Where ripples creep,
Lies a wee babe of Israel,
Alone, asleep!

Tiny the ark of rushes,
Why drifts it there?
Soothing the morning hushes,
The babe is fair!
Time will reveal God's purpose,
The story tell;
Doubt not his saving power,
Oh, Israel!

Sleep, babe, in peace; God wills it:
No danger fear;
Powers of earth shall tremble,
Thy God is near.
He will deliver Israel
From Pharaoh's hand;
Thou shalt behold in glory
The Promised Land.

Angels are bending o'er thee,
Safe watch they keep;
Watching the drifting cradle,
Oh blessed sleep!
Drifting upon the river,
Sleep thou the while,
Lulled by the breath of morning,
Sleep, babe of the Nile!

BAD DREAMS

Caused by Coffee.

"I have been a coffee drinker, more or less, ever since I can remember, until a few months ago I became more and more nervous and irritable, and finally I could not sleep at night, for I was horribly disturbed by dreams of all sorts and a species of distressing nightmare.

"Finally, after hearing the experience of numbers of friends who had quit coffee and were drinking Postum, and learning of the great benefits they had derived, I concluded coffee must be the cause of my trouble, so I got some Postum and had it made strictly according to directions.

"I was astonished at the flavor and taste. It entirely took the place of coffee, and to my very great satisfaction, I began to sleep peacefully and sweetly. My nerves improved, and I wish I could wean every man, woman and child from the unwholesome drug-drink—coffee.

"People do not really appreciate or realize what a powerful drug it is and what terrible effect it has on the human system. If they did, hardly a pound of coffee would be sold. I would never think of going back to coffee again. I would almost as soon think of putting my hand in a fire after I had once been burned. Yours for health."

Postum comes in two forms:

Regular Postum—must be well boiled. 15c and 25c packages.

Instant Postum—is a soluble powder. A teaspoonful dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. 30c and 50c tins.

The cost per cup of both kinds is about the same.

"There's a Reason" for Postum.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETINGS

NOTES ON THE CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR, EPWORTH LEAGUE AND BAPTIST YOUNG PEOPLE'S UNION TOPICS

Evenings with Great Hymns

Epworth League Topic for January 31

MANY Epworth Leaguers will think it strange that so quaint a hymn as Charles Wesley's "Wrestling Jacob" should be assigned for study in the series of "Evenings with Great Hymns." But if you will sit down quietly and read the hymn through you will feel not only the dramatic power and narrative interest of it, but something of its real value for present-day soul needs. Notice the strong and tender beauty of the fourth stanza of the hymn's second part:

I know thee, Saviour, who thou art,
Jesus, the feeble sinner's Friend;
Nor wilt thou with the night depart,
But stay and love me to the end.
Thy mercies never shall remove;
Thy nature and thy name is Love.

And the exhilaration of these lines:

I leap for joy, pursue my way,
And as a bounding hart fly home,
Through all eternity to prove
Thy nature and thy name is Love.

Old as the hymn is, it expresses soul facts that are ever new: the fact that each soul must deal individually with God before it can receive the right equipment for spiritual work; the fact that there must be an earnest determination in prayer for divine blessing; the fact that the real essence of the blessing God gives us is love. That is his nature and his name.

The other hymn, "O Love that Wilt Not Let Me Go," by Dr. George Matheson, has back of it a story that will forever add pathos to the wonderful lines themselves. Informed by his physicians that he would become totally blind the young Scottish clergyman went to tell his fiancée the dreadful news and offer her release from their engagement. She accepted his offer and the engagement was broken. Having lost at once love and the hope of sight he went to his study and out of the anguish of his soul wrote the deathless words:

"O love that wilt not let me go."

In Contrast with Christian Countries

B. Y. P. U. Topic for January 31.
(Ps. 72: 1-19. Conquest meeting.)

I HAVE a missionary friend in India who has suffered great hardships there but has built up a wonderful work. He came home on furlough, his hair whitened by Indian heat and the deadly fever. He enjoyed the vacation with his mother and other loved friends; America offered many attractions for pleasure and rest. But the pleading letters from his people beyond the sea, urging him to come back to them, tugged at his heartstrings and he was eager to get away. Some nights he could scarcely sleep, thinking of them. One young girl convert told of being cruelly beaten and tortured. Other similar stories brought him distress, and he sailed back, telling his friends that he never expected to come to America again and that if we wanted to see him we must come out to India.

This indicates some of the contrasts between life in Asia and in America. The multitudes of girl widows in India, condemned to lives of disgrace and suffering because the death of their husbands is believed to be caused by their own wickedness; the neglect of girl babies in China; the evils of the ridiculous yet horrible caste system in India; the oppression of the women of Mohammedanism; the immoralities of India and Japan—these are among the details which mark the difference between Christian and non-Christian countries. In Africa and Australasia there remain many of the darkens and cruelties of heathenism.

Just now Christendom should hide its head in shame at the spectacle of its armies destroying one another in Europe. There are cruelties and injustices and shameful immoralities in America, too. Yet while we are trying to right our domestic wrongs, and while we are praying that a way may be found to bring the great war to an end, we must not relax our interest in the people who have not yet been given their chance to accept the Gospel of Jesus with its real brotherly kindness and true piety.

Christian Endeavor Topic for January 31. Acts 16: 6-18

JUST now mission opportunities in the near East are scant. There will be little opportunity for fresh work till the war atmosphere has cleared. We must pray ardently for our missionaries in Syria and try to help meet their pressing temporal needs and the needs of the hunger sufferers there. After all, that is missionary work, and the money now being sent by Christian Herald readers for the destitute in Palestine will itself make new opportunities for telling the people there about the Christ whose love has inspired the gifts.

Opportunities in China are excellent in every way. The new republic has very friendly feelings toward America and welcomes our messages. The stand taken by President Yuan Shi Kai toward Confucianism will not interfere with the free work of Christian teachers.

In Japan missionaries and Sunday school workers are made welcome, Japanese statesmen confessing frankly the need of such instruction in morals for their children as Christian Sunday schools offer. The World's Sunday School Convention in Tokyo in 1916 will doubtless mark the beginning of new opportunities for still more wonderful and gracious spiritual victories in Japan.

Winter Tires

With a Bulldog Grip—Tough and Double-Thick

The All-Weather tread is an exclusive Goodyear feature. In a dozen ways it is the most efficient anti-skid that's known.

It is double-thick, and made of rubber toughened by a secret Goodyear process. This means maximum resistance both to wear and puncture.

The grips are deep and sharp. They last for thousands of miles. Their grasp on wet or icy roads is resistless.

They spread out, so strains are not centered as in old-time anti-skids. They are flat and regular, so they don't cause vibration. On all roads at all seasons they run as smoothly as plain treads.

No-Rim-Cut Tires
With All-Weather Treads or Smooth

THE GOODYEAR TIRE & RUBBER COMPANY, Akron, Ohio

You'll find anti-skids priced one-third higher, but nothing compares in modernness and merit with this Goodyear All-Weather tread.

Tire Royalty

The No-Rim-Cut tire with the All-Weather tread represents tire royalty. It can't be rim-cut. It gets the "On-Air" cure to save a major cause of blow-outs. It contains a patent feature to combat loose treads.

We spend $100,000 yearly on research and experiment to keep it the best tire built. And its sale—exceeding any other—shows that men regard it so. Get it, for your own sake. Any dealer will supply you.

Keep Your Lungs Strong

This advice is doubly important with the knowledge that every three minutes some one in the United States succumbs to consumption and many refuse to realize they are afflicted until it is too late.

It is after colds or sickness, from overwork, confining duties or when general weakness exists that tubercular germs thrive because the resistive powers of the body are weakened.

Only with fresh air, sunshine and abundant rich blood can one hope to arrest their progress, and the concentrated fats in Scott's Emulsion furnish fuel for rich blood, and its rare nourishment helps strengthen the lungs while it builds up the forces.

If you work indoors, tire easily, feel languid or run-down Scott's Emulsion is the most strengthening food-medicine known and is free from alcohol or stupefying drugs. Avoid substitutes.

Evangelists Begin Tour

THE Rev. Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman and Mr. Charles M. Alexander, who have recently held meetings in London, England, have arranged a United Evangelistic Campaign in Lima, Ohio, closing February 1. Big preparation has been made for the meetings, the town as been districted and a religious census taken. A working force of nearly 2,000 has been organized, and there will be a choir of 400. Many personal workers will serve at each meeting. The Campaign Association Committee in charge consists of thirty-six members, composed of the pastor and one layman from each of the eighteen churches taking part in the movement.

At the close of the Lima campaign Dr. Chapman goes to Atlanta, Ga., where a series of meetings has been arranged to begin February 2, closing March 28. From Atlanta, they will probably go to Charlotte, N. C., there to conduct a campaign from April 1 to May 10.

come. I simply must have you see him. "I wonder—oh, I wonder what you'll say! Of course we haven't seen our Jamie since he was four years old. He would be twelve now. This boy is twelve, I should judge. (He doesn't know his age.) He has hair and eyes not unlike our Jamie's. He is crippled, but that condition came upon him through a fall six years ago, and was made worse through another four years later. Anything like a complete description of his father's appearance seems impossible to obtain; but what I have learned contains nothing conclusive either for or against his being poor Doris's husband. He was called 'the Professor,' was very queer, and seemed to own nothing save a few books. This might or might not signify. John Kent was certainly always queer, and a good deal of a Bohemian in his tastes. Whether he cared for books or not I don't remember. Do you? And of course the title 'professor' might easily have been assumed, if he wished, or it might have been merely given him by others. As for this boy—I don't know, I don't know—but I do hope you will!

"Your distracted sister,
"RUTH."

Della came at once, and she went immediately to see the boy; but she did not "know." Like her sister, she said she did not think it was their Jamie, but at the same time there was that chance—it might be he, after all. Like Pollyanna, however, she had what she thought was a very satisfactory way out of the dilemma.

"But why don't you take him, dear?" she proposed to her sister. "Why don't you take him and adopt him?" It would be lovely for him—poor little fellow—and—"But Mrs. Carew shuddered and would not let her finish.

"No, no, I can't, I can't!" she moaned. "I want my Jamie, my own Jamie—or no one." And with a sigh Della gave it up and went back to her nursing.

If Mrs. Carew thought that this closed the matter, however, she was again mistaken; for her days were still restless, and her nights were either sleepless or filled with dreams of a "may be" or a "might be" masquerading as an "it is so." She was, moreover, having a difficult time with Pollyanna.

Pollyanna was puzzled. She was filled with questionings and unrest. For the first time in her life Pollyanna had come face to face with real poverty. She knew people who did not have enough to eat, who wore ragged clothing, and who lived in dark, dirty, and very tiny rooms. Her first impulse, of course, had been "to help." With Mrs. Carew she made two visits to Jamie, and greatly did she rejoice at the changed conditions she found there after "that man Dodge" had "tended to things." But this, to Pollyanna, was a mere drop in the bucket. There were yet all those other sick-looking men, unhappy-looking women and ragged children out in the street—Jamie's neighbors. Confidently she looked to Mrs. Carew for help for them also.

"Indeed!" exclaimed Mrs. Carew, when she learned what was expected of her, "so you want the whole street to be supplied with fresh paper, paint and new stairways, do you? Pray, is there anything else you'd like?"

"Oh, yes, lots of things," sighed Pollyanna, happily. "You see, there are so many things they need—all of them! And what fun it will be to get them! How I wish I was rich so I could help, too; but I'm 'most as glad to be with you when you get them."

Mrs. Carew quite gasped aloud in her amazement. She lost no time—though she did lose not a little patience—in explaining that she had no intention of doing anything further in "Murphy's Alley," and that there was no reason why she should. No one would expect her to. She had canceled all possible obligations, and had even been really very generous, any one would say, in what she had done for the tenement where lived Jamie and the Murphys. (That she owned the tenement building she did not think it necessary to state.) At some length she explained to Pollyanna that there were charitable institutions, both numerous and efficient, whose business it was to aid all worthy poor, and that to these institutions she gave frequently and liberally.

Even then, however, Pollyanna was not convinced.

"But I don't see," she argued, "why it's any better, or even so nice, for a whole lot of people to club together and do what everybody would like to do for themselves. I'm sure I'd much rather give Jamie a—nice book, now, than to have some old society do it; and I know he'd like better to have me do it, too."

"Very likely," returned Mrs. Carew, with some weariness and a little exasperation. "But it is just possible that it would not be so well for Jamie as—as if that book were given by a body of people who knew what sort of one to select."

This led her to say much, also (none of which Pollyanna in the least understood), about "pauperizing the poor," the "evils of indiscriminate giving," and the "pernicious effect of unorganized charity."

"Besides," she added, in answer to the still perplexed expression on Pollyanna's worried little face, "very likely if I offered help to these people they would not take it. You remember Mrs. Murphy declined, at the first, to let me send food and clothing—though they accepted it readily enough from their neighbors on the first floor, it seems."

"Yes, I know," sighed Pollyanna, turning away. "There's something there somehow I don't understand. But it doesn't seem right that we should have such a lot of nice things, and that they shouldn't have anything, hardly."

As the days passed this feeling on the part of Pollyanna increased rather than diminished; and the questions she asked and the comments she made were anything but a relief to the state of mind in which Mrs. Carew herself was. Even the test of the glad game, in this case, Pollyanna was finding to be very near a failure; for, as she expressed it:

"I don't see how you can find anything about this poor-people business to be glad for. Of course we can be glad for ourselves that we aren't poor like them; but whenever I'm thinking how glad I am for that, I get so sorry for them that I can't be glad any longer. Of course we could be glad there were poor folks, because we could help them. But if we don't help them, where's the glad part of that coming in?" And to this Pollyanna could find no one who could give her a satisfactory answer.

Especially she asked this question of Mrs. Carew; and Mrs. Carew, still haunted by the visions of the Jamie that was, and the Jamie that might be, grew only more restless, more wretched and more utterly despairing. Nor was she helped any by the approach of Christmas. Nowhere was there glow of holly or flush of tinsel that did not carry its pang to her; for always to Mrs. Carew it but symbolized a child's empty stocking—a stocking that might be—Jamie's.

Finally, a week before Christmas, she fought what she thought was the last battle with herself. Resolutely, but with no real joy in her face, she gave terse orders to Mary, and summoned Pollyanna.

"Pollyanna," she began, almost harshly, "I have decided—to take Jamie. The car will be here at once. I'm going after him now, and bring him home. You may come with me if you like."

A great light transfigured Pollyanna's face.

"Oh, oh, oh, how glad I am!" she breathed. "Why, I'm so glad I—I want to cry! Mrs. Carew, why is it, when you're the very gladdest of anything, you always want to cry?"

"I don't know, I'm sure, Pollyanna," rejoined Mrs. Carew, abstractedly. On Mrs. Carew's face there was still no look of joy.

Once in the Murphys' little one-room apartment it did not take Mrs. Carew long to tell her errand. In a few short sentences she told the story of the lost Jamie, and of her hopes that his Jamie might be he. She made no secret of her doubts that he was the one; at the same time she said she had decided to take him home and give him every possible advantage. Then, a little wearily, she told what were the plans he had made for him.

At the foot of the bed Mrs. Murphy stoned, crying softly. Across the room Jerry Murphy, his eyes dilating, emitted an occasional low, "Can ye eat that, now?" As to Jamie—Jamie, in the bed, had listened at first with the air of one to whom suddenly a door has opened into a longed-for paradise; but gradually, as Mrs. Carew talked, a new look came into his eyes. Very slowly he closed them and turned away his face.

When Mrs. Carew ceased speaking there was a long silence before Jamie turned his head and answered. Then they saw that his face was very white, and that his eyes were full of tears. "Thank you, Mrs. Carew, but—I can't go," he said simply.

"You can't—what?" cried Mrs. Carew, as if she doubted the evidence of her own ears.

"Jamie!" gasped Pollyanna.

"Oh, come, kid, what's eatin' ye?" growled Jerry, hurriedly coming forward. "Don't ye know a good thing when ye see it?"

"Yes; but I can't—go," said the rippled boy again.

"But, Jamie, Jamie, think, think that it would mean to you!" quavered Mrs. Murphy at the foot of the bed.

"I am a-thinkin'," choked Jamie. "Don't you suppose I know what I'm givin'—what I'm givin' up?" Then to Mrs. Carew he turned tear-wet eyes. "I can't," he faltered. "I can't let you do all that for me. If you—cared, it would be different. But you don't care—not really. You don't want me—not me. You want the real Jamie, and I ain't the real Jamie. You don't think I am. I can see it in your face." "I know. But—" began Mrs. Carew helplessly.

"And it isn't as if—as if I was like the other boys, and could walk, either," interrupted the cripple, feverishly. "You'd get tired of me in no time, and I'd see it comin'. I couldn't stand—to be a burden like that. Of course, you cared—like mumsey here—" He threw out his hand, choked back a sob, then turned his head away again. "I'm not the Jamie you want. I—can't—go," he said. With the words in thin, boyish hand fell clenched till the knuckles showed white against the attired old shawl that covered the bed.

There was a moment's breathless hush; then, very quietly, Mrs. Carew got to her feet. Her face was colorless; but there was that in it that silenced the sob that rose to Pollyanna's lips.

"Come, Pollyanna," was all she said. "Well, if you ain't the fool limit!" babbled Jerry Murphy to the boy on the bed, as the door closed a moment later.

But the boy on the bed was crying every much as if the closing of the door had been the one that led to paradise—and that had closed now forever.

Dull Days Saved by Bran Food

Pettijohn's is a breakfast dainty made by flaking soft white wheat. It appeals to every taste.

Its unique value lies in a softened bran. There is 25 per cent of it, yet so tender that one hardly knows it is there.

Bran is Nature's laxative. Most folks who don't get it must take drugs. Every doctor advises it. Here you get it in a luscious form—in a flaky delicacy which everyone enjoys.

THE PROMISE OF A GARDEN

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

ONCE every winter the lure of a coming springtime reaches out to me from the depths of the swirling snow, and across the wind-swept, gray-colored city I hear the pipes of Pan calling. At such times I lay down my pen and dream of blue June skies, and flowering plants, and trailing vines, and gardens.

It all started this year with a bulb, a brown bulb that was beginning to sprout. It was given to me in the middle of a deadly tiresome, hopelessly long afternoon, while I was trying to put a commonplace little thought into a commonplace little article.

"Is it an onion?" I asked a bit doubtfully. (I am not fond of onions.) "Oh, no," answered the girl who brought it, "it is a lily bulb."

I regarded the bit of brownness in my hand with rather skeptical eyes. It did not look as if it could ever be a lily—a gold-hearted lily with a long graceful stalk.

"How shall I plant it—here?" I inquired. My eyes wandered over the plain, practical office room, the dull cold-looking outside world.

"Why," the girl smiled at the puzzled look in my eyes, "why, it's very easy." She produced a small saucer filled with pebbles and set my lily bulb firmly in the middle of it. "Just fill this with water, and in a few weeks—before you know it—" Her silence was so impressive that I saw, in my mind's eye, a tall green plant growing bravely.

The week after the little bulb came to live in my office was a very wintry week, but every morning I waded through drifts and slipped over icy pavements with a bit of eagerness in my heart. Every morning I dashed from the elevator to my room and looked anxiously at the lily bulb. For three days I was rewarded only by the sight of worm-like roots, but on the fourth I saw a slender, pale green leaf that lifted its head proudly to the world. It was on the fourth day that the lure of springtime perched on my desk and banished the darkness of the world outside.

In school my teachers used to tell me that I would be an artist some day, perhaps. With stubby pencil and wicked, double-pointed pen, with crayon and water colors and smudgy charcoal, I had builded dream castles that had risen bubble-like and broken just as easily. Fastening my eyes on the bowl with its baby plant I reached for a sheet of paper and a stubby yellow pencil. I began to draw a garden.

As my now unskilful fingers shaded and drew heavy lines, erased and drew lighter ones, a queer little landscape began to take form on the paper. There was a huge elm tree standing by a crumbling stone wall, and a little lonely path, with a clump of withered bushes banked up against it, ran crookedly across the foreground. I made small sketchy daubs across the wall and imagined that they were the trailing kind of nasturtiums, the kind that grow so easily and are so wonderful of color. Roughly I erased the straggling row of bushes and drew some dots on high stalks. I tried to imagine that they were phlox, the pale pink and deep rose and white phlox that you see growing in illustrated seed catalogues. I drew a little series of curlycues as a border to the path and made believe hard that small pansy faces smiled up at me.

The corner of the paper was bare of any drawing and I hurried breathlessly to fill it in. Asters in clumps and late roses covered the space completely, with gayety and fragrance and color. I remembered a page picture of them—yellow and red and white for the asters, some mottled faintly and some huge double ones; the roses in softer shades, some growing on low bushes and some with a single flower on a long stem.

Behind the stone wall, in the background of the picture, there was a space of sky. Darkly against the blackness of it I made the outlines of a tiny, low cottage. I drew flaming hollyhocks against the wall and twined a rambler rose with clematis over the doorway. It was a dream house, set in the middle of a dream garden.

"Behind the cottage," I told myself, "where nobody can see it, there is a little space of land covered with corn and big red tomatoes and shining green peppers." I shut my eyes and saw cauliflowers and cabbages and lettuce nestled on the ground like small rosettes on a child's Easter hat. I saw tall green poles with beans twined about them and yellow squashes gleaming like gold in the sun. I sighed and the pencil fell from my hands and lay, stubbier than ever, on my desk.

The door opened and a man came in. As he passed me he looked over my shoulder rather curiously. "What are you doing?" he asked.

"Why," I told him, "I'm having the best time! I'm planning a garden."

He looked at me with a puzzled sort of wonder in his eyes. "A garden!" he exclaimed. "It's snowing outside; it's winter!"

Bravely I defended my idea. "Winter is the best time to plan a garden," I told him. "The only time. All of the farmers are buying their seed and the suburban folk are wondering what they ought to plant in the bed under the bay window. Even clerks who live in the city are looking in flower shop windows and wishing they had a garden plot. . . . I think everybody in the world ought to have a garden—even if it's only a bird-seed planted in a cracked cup."

The man laughed. "May I see the plan of your garden?" he asked.

I handed him the picture a bit self-consciously. "I meant to be an artist—once," I told him.

The man stared at the drawing for a moment. Then he laid it down on my desk. "It's lucky," he said, "that you decided to write instead."

With a start I looked at the picture and saw only a white sheet covered with vague pencilings and smears. Gazing out of the window I saw an early dusk creeping softly over cold city streets. But as I turned back to my work with a sigh I saw the growing lily bulb and its tiny green leaf was the promise of a garden that I am going to have some day.

THE PRAYER LEAGUE

A READER from South Dakota writes: "Some time ago I wrote you, asking your readers to pray for me. I had earned money which had not been paid me and don't believe I ever would have gotten it without help from God. But in a few days after writing to you I got every cent of it. No one could make me believe but the money came in answer to prayer."

J. L. DeG. writes from Michigan: "I have had for some time a very troublesome business burden from which I saw no relief, although I prayed. So I decided to send a request for help, but to my surprise, yesterday before I started to write this letter, the burden was lifted. Glory to his name. 'Before they call I will answer.' Isa. 65: 24."

Acknowledgments of answers to prayer have also been received from: A Subscriber, Minneapolis, Minn.; Mrs. J. J. Y., El Paso, Ill.; T. S. G., Mica, N. C.; P. A. M., Spalding, Sask.; Mrs. J. G. S., Griggsville, Ill.; E. B., Paterson, N. J.; Mrs. W. F. L., Austin, Texas; H. C. W., Iowa; A. S., Sharon, Pa.; Mrs. C. M. R., New Church, from 20 acres in San Joaquin Valley California

A railroad brakeman, getting along in years, with no prospect of advancement, and guarding against the "blue-envelope" day that might dismiss him, bought a 20-acre farm in the fertile San Joaquin Valley, California, at $300 per acre (part on time payments). Nine acres each were planted to peaches and raisin grapes. From his 1914 crop he has a net profit above all expenses of $1,200, 20 per cent on his investment and a living besides. This first year he was new to conditions; next year he expects to do much better. Don't you want to do as well? Our San Joaquin Valley folder, free, tells of the experiences of many others, describes living conditions, crop possibilities, and in general answers the questions a man seeking to better his prospects wants to know about. It's worth money to you. Write for it to-day and tell me the line of farming you prefer, so that I can give you special information.

A Sister writes: "At this time the greatest sorrow of my life is upon me. Will you not pray fervently each day for the return of my sister, that she may throw off the influence which has bed her away." A Subscriber, of Minneapolis, Minn., writes: "My only daughter is in the hospital sick. I have lost two children in the last year and a half years. The loss of this one would leave me all alone. Please ask the Prayer League for prayers in her behalf."

E. H. asks prayer for a man nearly blind, whose mind is failing and whose afflictions are causing him to lose faith. M. C. asks repeated prayers for deliverance from great trouble, and for divine guidance. A Boston reader asks prayer for four women who are in great trouble, one of them is yet sure that Christ is the Saviour. Mrs. E. A. B. asks prayer that she may succeed in getting a widow's pension, that her eyes may be healed and strengthened, that a father of five little children be saved from the drink habit, and that both he and his wife be truly converted, also for continued prayers for a niece who suffers from mental trouble.

The following interesting letters come from G. W. I., Reno, Nev., which we know, receive the earnest thought and prayer of the League:

ask prayer for the conversion of the Pai Ute Indian medicine man Jack Wilson, as he is cured by whites; Wevo-ca (the cutter) is his Indian name. This man in 1888 to 1899 was leader of the Ghost Dance and Messiah Craze, and caused for five years great excitement among western Indians until the United States Government stopped the dances. I have recently met this man, who is a good farmer, sixty years old, and am trying to lead him to give up his heathen ideas. He neither smokes nor chews tobacco and is strictly temperate and opposed to the sale of intoxicating liquors. Pray for him. He has been my friend for months and by his invitation I have visited his home eighty miles south. He has several children. If he becomes a Christian he can do great good. There are but very few Pai Ute Christians. There are about 6,000 Pai Utes in Nevada and Utah. They are friends of the whites and as a rule industrious."

Prayers are requested for revivals at Sanford, Fla.; Montpelier, N. D.; Cays Lake, Ill.; El Paso, Ill.; for an outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon meetings to be held at Lafayette, N. Y.; Riverside, Mich.; upon the town and vicinity of Griggsville, Ind., and for special blessing upon the Baptist church there; upon the community of Vico, Neb.; Owensdale, Pa.; for blessing upon the Presbyterian church at Woodburn, Ky., and for the conversion of the unsaved in that community; for the growth and success of a church at Cartersville, Mo., and the salvation of souls there; for God's blessing upon the community of Lansing, Mich., and that Christian workers may be sent there; for revival in a church at Weston, Mass. Mrs. E. R. asks prayer that all the members of her Sunday school class be brought to Christ and to consecrated Christian service; Mrs. C. S. W., for a special blessing upon each member of her Sunday school class and the families they represent.

M. F. E. asks prayer that her brother's mind may be restored; Mrs. O. A. P., that her son's mind may be restored; Mrs. P. B. W., that sister's mind may be restored; A Wife, for the strengthening of her husband's mind.

Mrs. I. M. C. and N. M. A. request prayer for strengthening of sight.

Twenty-one friends ask prayer for a deeper work of grace, assurance of sins forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing.

Eight friends ask prayer that relatives or friends may be cured of the appetite for strong drink, including one who asks prayer that three sons and a son-in-law may be saved from the drink habit.

Fifteen parents ask prayer for the conversion of sons, including one who asks prayer that three sons may be saved.

Eight wives ask prayer for the conversion of their husbands.

Twenty-four friends ask prayer for the conversion of other relatives and friends.

Nine readers ask prayer for special spiritual blessing for relatives or friends.

Two daughters ask prayer for the healing of mothers; one daughter for the healing of father; six mothers and fathers for the healing of daughters; seven wives for the healing of husbands; three friends ask prayer for the healing of sisters; one for the healing of a brother; twenty-three for healing for themselves, including one, that power of speech and use of limbs be restored; sixteen for the healing of other relatives and friends, including one that a son who has never been able to talk may be cured of nervousness and receive the power of speech.

Ten friends ask prayer for healing of hearing for themselves or others.

Eighteen friends ask prayer for help or guidance in financial affairs for themselves or others.

Thirty-one friends ask prayer for the granting of varied desires and needs, including one that her husband, now suing for divorce, may drop the proceedings and return home; another that husband may return home; another, that a son may return home; another, that a stain may be removed from father's name; another, that son may return home and a heavy burden be lifted; another, that a brother, who has left home, may be found and restored to his family.

Nature undoubtedly intended Florida as the world's greatest source of supply for oranges and grapefruit. Grown here, they reach the greatest perfection of quality. The soil of the citrus fruit section of Florida produces orange and grapefruit trees of unusual vigor. Florida showers and sunshine supply just the elements needed to ripen into rich, spicy, juicy and sweet oranges and grapefruit, the product of these fine trees. They gather flavor and sweetness as they ripen.

Florida's Soil and Climate Give to Her Oranges and Grapefruit Surpassing Quality

When allowed to ripen on the trees and then carefully picked, packed and shipped, this splendid fruit keeps well and will reach the consumer in fine condition.

Realizing that the producers' prosperity depends finally upon the consumers' satisfaction with the product, progressive orange and grapefruit growers of Florida have formed the Florida Citrus Exchange, a co-operative, non-profit-making association for mutual protection and benefit of all concerned.

The Exchange insists that its members send to market only tree-ripened fruit, handled by white-gloved workers, and every doubtful orange or grapefruit be discarded. No matter what grade of fruit you buy, you will get your money's worth if the red mark of the Florida Citrus Exchange is on boxes and wrappers.

Good dealers handle Exchange fruit. For booklet of citrus fruit recipes send four cents in stamps to Florida Citrus Exchange, 625 Citizens' Bank Building, Tampa, Fla.

LOOK AHEAD, THINK AHEAD

A BUSINESS man, head of a large manufacturing concern, in sending holiday greetings to his friends, gave some very practical advice. As we believe it will interest Christian Herald readers, we give his letter below:

It is difficult for me to realize that a year has elapsed since it was my pleasure and privilege to wish you the compliments of the season. In many respects it has been a hard year, because of the rumors of war and a big legislative program in our own country; climaxed by the enactment of the greatest international treaty in history in other parts of the world. We weathered one of the roughest storms that ever struck the world's business.

The undoing of the commerce of our foreign competitors may prove the making of a great internationalism in our country's commerce. There will mean prosperity, and "prosperity breeds prosperity." The President and the body of the administration are now pledged to cooperate with the business men. Our crops—at all real wealth comes from the ground—are the greatest in history. The new Federal banking system is running smoothly. The railroads' action to increase freight charges has been rejected. Money in every center is getting very much cheaper, thus enabling the railroads and large industrial establishments to do their necessary financing, practically none of which was done in the past year, and this will mean much industrial progress. Savings are accumulating because people have, at least temporarily, checked their extravagance. In short, the American business man has no place for pessimism in planning for 1915.

We here confidently expect that 1915 will be the biggest and greatest year in the history of the Hamilton Watch Company. Your co-operation and heartfelt interest in the past have been more than appreciated, for which we are duly grateful. With your continued interest and renewed effort we shall succeed in our greatest hopes.

Therefore, let us resolve to look ahead; see the bright horizon for American business that even the war clouds can't hide; think ahead, good thoughts are an inspiration; plan ahead, and before 1915 is very far along, we shall all find that we are getting ahead as never before.

I wish you and all dear to you in a personal way, and all those associated with you in your business, a very happy Christmas. And may your happy Christmas be the forerunner of a year of unparalleled health, happiness and prosperity. That is my Christmas greeting. Cordially and sincerely yours,

CHARLES T. MILLER, President.

Questions and Answers

E. M. T., Virginia. I have been tossed on the sea of uncertainty and unbelief for the past sixteen years, and it has nearly worn me out, body, mind and spirit. Can you help me? If I could see the worthy teachings of my Bible as very truth, how happy a life of Christian service would be!

The first step is to stop all anxious worry about this matter. God is going to take care of you. Christ is a very kind physician, and his first treatment for one who is all worn out and weary with fruitless mental effort is rest. "Come unto me, and I will give you rest," he is urging. He would say to you, as he said once to his disciples: "Come ye yourselves into a desert place, and rest a while." The mental effort you have been making is in the wrong direction. One does not find the Christian life as one masters the multiplication table, by mental effort and application. It is as if you were longing to hear a beautiful piece of music; and instead of going to hear the music when you were near the place in which it was being rendered, you should spend your time and strength studying the scientific meaning and methods of melody, harmony, etc. To delve into these studies does not make you hear music. You must go where the music is being made and listen to it. While you are listening you will not be puzzling your own brain, or trying to understand anything. It is in some such way that the soul finds and touches Christ—by ceasing to struggle, by ceasing to figure things out, by yielding the soul to him in complete abandonment. You will be greatly helped by going among the most intensely spiritual people you know. You may shrink from this. You may find their ways and their sayings distasteful, because your heart has not yet been put into tune. But go to their meetings; give yourself up to the atmosphere of them; be reasonable enough to admit that God would like to do for you what he has done for them, to bless you as he has blessed them. We can get help reading our Bibles alone, but we get added help in understanding the Bible and in getting acquainted with Christ by associating with spiritually minded people. Above all—begin and begin now, to trust Christ himself. Test him. Accept the fact of his divinity and his power to forgive and cleanse you and become your friend as a mathematician or logician accepts a "hypothesis." Take it for granted it is true, and as you take it for granted you will begin to find the evidence in your own heart and mind that it is true indeed. Then begin at once to help others. Forget yourself in helping them, and the light of Christ will keep growing brighter and brighter in your life.

J. F. R., Lansdale, Pa. According to the view held by the leading commentators, the ceremonial or ritual department of the Mosaic laws (which dealt with meats, drinks and carnal ordinances) were purely typical in character, and were abolished by the Gospel. "They ceased to have any pertinence, the reality having come of which they were but the figures." The moral law, however—which is eternal and unchangeable—"was fulfilled rather than abrogated by the Gospel." This would seem to sufficiently cover the case stated in your letter.

J. B. Z., Harriman, Ore. The code of Hammurabi was a body of laws drawn up by that king about 2250 B.C. He was the sixth king of the first dynasty of Babylon. The laws were inscribed on a stele (slab) of black diorite. The stele or slab was discovered in three fragments in December, 1901, and January, 1902, by J. J. M. de Morgan at Persepolis on the site of Susa, capital of the ancient Elam. The stele, complete (which is supposed to have been carried to Susa from the temple E-barrah at Sippar) contains the text of 247 of Hammurabi's laws, which show a wholly unsuspected degree of culture and present a number of parallels to the early Hebrew legislation.

A Western Reader. Your case is like that of many others, who in seeking a higher experience are confronted with certain deeds of the past with the suggestion that confession and restitution be made. All the instances you mention are perplexing, and in settling them you need help from divine rather than human wisdom. A few principles, however, are fixed, and apply without exception to all such cases. In the first place you must bring yourself to agree to obey God at any cost. This is precisely what Jesus meant by his stern words about the right eye or the right hand. He probably did not mean that a circumstance would ever arise in which a man should pluck out his eye or cut off his hand. He thought too much of efficiency for that. He wants two-eyed and two-armed men in his army. But he did mean that it is far more important to obey God than it is to have two arms and two eyes. We must become so desperately in earnest to be right with God that we promise him that when he makes his will fear. People do not ridicule the "conscience fund." They admire a man who is trying to do absolutely right. In the case of conduct in which others are involved the matter is more difficult. If your confession involves another, make very sure that the offense was really a serious matter and confer with those involved before making any statement. In the specific case you mention, it seems to us, from the facts as stated, that no confession is required. As to clear we will obey. Now that does not mean that we must go right off and do some fantastic or unreasonable thing before God has made his will clear. We must wait till his will is clear. That is all the consecration he ever asks from anybody: to obey, step by step, as he makes the way unmistakably plain. "My sheep know my voice," he said. If you are not sure it is his voice speaking, wait till you are sure before taking the step. Where any property is involved, even if the amount is very small, it should be returned to the owner or his heirs. You will find such a procedure easier than you making financial restitution out of funds absolutely needed for present use, that problem is more difficult. In such a case it would be wise to make confession to those who were wronged, and ask them to give you time to make full restitution. Above all, think of God as a friend, who is trying to lead you to a place of perfect happiness, not as a tyrant demanding obedience to harsh and arbitrary rules. He is our best friend. You may win peace by trusting him. Then he will guide and strengthen you in untangling the problems and undoing the mistakes of the past.

SIGISMUND PLACE, IN WARSAW

THE PUBLIC SQUARE IN LODZ

THE RUSSIAN POLAND OF TODAY

BY REV. FRANCIS E. CLARK, D.D., LL.D.

MY INTRODUCTION to Russian Poland was an interesting one, at least interesting to me as I think it over today. My wife and I had come from Berlin on a slow night train, and about daylight on a raw November morning we were bundled out of the train and of that we were at the Russian frontier customhouse.

We found ourselves in the midst of a crowd of tiny moujiks with dirtier passports which the inspector slowly examined, and then passed the others, with their scant baggage, through a wicket from Germany into Russia. Our turn came, and I handed in my handsome United States passport, signed by Elihu Root, then secretary of state. It was examined critically and at length, and finally I was allowed to pass through the gate and found myself on Russian soil.

I supposed of course that my wife, who was directly behind me, would follow; but no, the gate opened to between us, and she was left in Germany. A long wrangle followed, while I insisted on the lady on the other side of the fence was the one described in the passport as my "wife." How could Mr. Inspector tell? Why should he take my word for it?

However, at last he concluded that he would risk it, as she was a little woman who does not look like an anarchist or a bomb-thrower. So the astute officer wrote in Russian on the back of the passport that I was accompanied by my wife, "Mary," though her parents never gave her that name, and we were united again and this time on Russian soil.

We boarded a train and steamed slowly off into the heart of Russian Poland, bound for Pabianice and Lodz (names that have become sadly familiar to newspaper readers of late). Here a large Christian Endeavor convention was to be held, which should bring together Endeavorers from all parts of Russian Poland.

After station on the wind-swept prairies of ancient Poland was passed, after brief stops, and at last as the train slowed down I saw a sign which began to spell out painfully in the almost unintelligible Russian characters what looked like "B-I-A-N-I-C-E." Suddenly a lady appeared, leaning down the platform, and as she saw a foreign lady at the window of our compartment, she ran out in German, "Mrs. Clark, Mrs. Clark, get up quick!"

In the meantime she had sent a porter through the long train to get our baggage, and in two minutes (she had persuaded the guard to hold the train an extra minute) we found ourselves on the platform, and in five minutes more we were happily seated in the comfortable and roomy Lutheran parlor, with a new idea of what a quick-witted American wife could do when she had only two minutes to do it in.

Needless to say that under such auspices the Endeavor convention was well managed and successful. From all parts of Russian Poland they came, some from a distance of 250 miles: as intelligent, warm-hearted, earnest a company of young Christians as I have ever seen.

And this was in the very heart of blood-drenched Poland today. Pabianice has been under fire. Hostile armies have marched and counter-marched through the busy streets which I saw thronged with workmen going to and returning from the great woolen and cotton mills. I greatly fear that the fine church and parsonage of my good friend, the Lutheran pastor, are now but blackened ruins, though I have not been able to hear from him, and that the thriving little city is but a memory of former industry, thrift and prosperity.

Only fifteen miles away, and connected by steam railway and trolley, is the great manufacturing city of Lodz, around which the fiercest fighting in Russia has recently centered. Here is a city of half a million people; a modern city, which did not exist a century ago; a city which of late has grown as rapidly as Chicago; a city of middle-class people and workmen and great factories. But what is left of it? Who can tell? "700,000 people in Lodz and its neighborhood on the verge of starvation," is the report in a recent paper. Discount this as much as you will, yet what is left represents an awful amount of suffering and privation.

And who are these people that are feeling today

all the horrors of war? They represent one of the noblest races of Europe. They are as innocent of all responsibility for the war as the Belgians themselves, and they are suffering equally its pangs. Yet the sympathy of all the world has gone out to the Belgians, while few comparatively have thought of or given to the Poles.

It is well to refresh our minds with some salient facts concerning their history. Many centuries ago, five or six centuries, perhaps, after Christ was born, a Slavic race, called the Polani, settled in the great plain between the Oder and the Vistula, the latter a name forever connected with some of the most horrid scenes in that awful year of carnage, 1914. The Polani were superior, mentally and physically, to many of the Slavic tribes around them, and they gradually conquered or absorbed these neighbors, and extended their own territory until, in the middle of the sixteenth century, it extended from the Baltic to the Carpathians, a territory of 280,000 square miles, about the size of the state of Texas.

For a time the kingdom of Poland was one of the great powers of Europe, but a succession of bad and weak kings and many internal quarrels wrought the havoc that was to be expected, and gradually their golden day of influence and power waned, until it was totally eclipsed in the partition of ancient Poland between Russia, Austria and Prussia.

Not once, nor twice, but three times was this division made, each time a larger slice of devoted Poland being taken by the allies, allies then, but foes now, for Russia was quite as eager as Austria or Prussia to get her share of the spoil. Indeed, she got by far the larger slice, since in the final division in the early part of the nineteenth century, 220,000 square miles fell to her share, some 35,000 to Austria and 25,000 to Prussia.

It must not be supposed that there have been no bright spots in Polish history. Indeed, it is full of heroic deeds. Sobieski, the great general, who defeated the Turks at the very gates of Vienna, drove back the invading hordes and saved all Western Europe and perhaps America from the curse of Mohammedanism, must be reckoned as one of the world's chief benefactors, and he was a Pole.

Kosciuszko, who fought side by side with Washington in our own revolutionary war, who was afterwards military governor of West Point, who defeated the Russians at Warsaw, and who almost established Poland's freedom, is another world's hero, and he was a Pole.

"Freedom shrieked when Kosciuszko fell," wrote Campbell, and ten thousand schoolboys have since declaimed his stirring lines.

And who are these people that are feeling today

THE WAR IN EUROPE

BY ANTHONY ARNOUX

European journalist of many years' standing; military critic; staff writer of the Paris Daily Mail and Le Temps; contributor to l'Indépendance Belge

ONE feature of this war which has not been given the attention it really deserves is the extreme efficiency of the medical service, both curative and preventive. In Napoleon's day it is asserted that forty per cent. of the wounded who were sufficiently fortunate to reach a hospital perished. Two, three or four patients were placed in a single bed. Gangrene and various fevers prevailed to such an extent that a hospital was really a charnel house.

Even in our Civil War, fifty years later, the half-way war between the Napoleonic campaigns and the war of today, almost like conditions prevailed. Bullets killed many, but disease killed more. Here are the figures: Killed in battle, 67,058; died of wounds, 43,012; or, from the actual fighting, 110,060; died of disease, 199,105. This war will show no such proportions.

Preventive measures, with their practically complete conquest of small-pox and typhoid; their partial conquest of pneumonia and kindred ailments; their attention to the food, its quality, quantity and cooking; their control of the sanitary conditions of camps and lines of march, particularly of the sinks, through liberal use of disinfectants, which things are done by a special corps organized for the express purpose in the army of today: all these measures have made the conditions under which the modern soldier exists in war times often healthier than those in which he exists at home.

The life, largely in the open air, with plenty of exercise and usually plenty of nourishing food, rapidly hardens the men and so raises their power of resistance that the exposure and the wettings, etc., have little effect. We are now in the middle of a winter campaign, and the complaints of illness and of suffering are less than they were in September, and mostly come from the troops which have recently taken the field.

Not only has the curative work of the medical corps tremendously advanced, but its organization as applied to war conditions has been made well nigh perfect. It is said, and with good reason, that in no prior war has the attention given to the wounded been so prompt and so efficient. Caring for the wounded has been reduced to the same practical basis that characterizes the rest of army activities.

A special corps is consecrated to this service, men who do nothing else, and this organization is mobilized with the army and is provided with the most modern equipment for transporting and caring for the wounded. The automobile is everywhere in evidence and many special types of motor cars have been invented for this service. Notable among these is a truck with a body so arranged that stretchers are placed in it in tiers, and another which, in addition to carrying wounded itself, draws five two-wheel trailers, each equipped with two cots. Besides these there are cycle-car ambulances and stretchers, so contrived that they can be slung one on either side of a horse. And when necessary, all sorts of wheeled vehicles are pressed into service.

Under ordinary circumstances the field telephone can summon one of these to any point needed. During a battle they wait just behind the line, sometimes under fire, by the hundreds, and as fast as filled rush their cargoes to the field hospital.

Some of the wounded are able to walk to the ambulances, the others the litter-bearers bring in. It is very rare that a wounded man has to lie very long without attention. The men of the ambulance corps, of all the combatants, have shown the utmost devotion and courage in exposing themselves to danger and going under the heaviest fire to bring in the wounded. Many of them have been decorated for their bravery in this regard.

Once in the ambulance, the wounded are hurried off to the field hospitals, where devoted men and women are awaiting their arrival with everything in readiness to minister to them. Those whose condition is such that they cannot to be moved farther remain here, and the others, after having their wounds dressed and being fed and made comfortable, are sent farther back to the base hospital.

FRENCH SOLDIERS ON SEARCH FOR SPIES

Antiseptics everywhere, everything used on the wounded sterilized, automobiles fitted up with distilling apparatus for furnishing pure water, others fitted up as an operating room, with glass-topped tables and all the other accessories of the well-organized hospital, others arranged so as to assure an ample supply of hot water day and night, etc.—nothing known to medical science, as either curative or palliative, is lacking.

Red Cross men and women, trained to their business, second the doctors efficiently, and the whole sad business is done without hitch, fuss or panic; even the Red Cross dogs seem to appreciate the importance of the work they are engaged in, and only bark when there is a reason.

Among the wounded there is no complaint. These soldiers do not grudge having given the best of their lives in the service of their country.

"Thank God," said a debonair young Englishman, whose cheek had been torn away by a shell; "thank God, I don't feel as bad as I look."

"I have been lucky," said a cheery little German, who had lost both legs.

factory. As this reply is primary only, and as, true to diplomatic practices, the preliminary note contains the usual compliments and recognition of some ground of complaint, though equally maintaining the justice and expediency of the practices complained of, which is the usual course pursued when it is intended that the definite reply shall contain concessions it is perhaps not worth while to take in the preliminary reply, is morally certain that this point will be, to a great extent, abandoned in the definite reply.

The actual happenings of the campaign in Poland, freed from the confusing details, seem to be about as follows:

During the last week the weather in Central Poland has not been so favorable for military operations as cold and wet to permit the flanking of somewhat marshy country to dry, and not cold and dry enough to freeze the ground, bogs and rivers.

During this time the German invading force has, to a large degree, marked time, though scoring now and then on some point of the line of battle running from the Tula to the east of Plock to Tarnobrzeg in Galicia, an advance of more or less importance in the direction of the objective, the line of the Vistula from Novogeorgievsk to Ivangorod.

The sum total of these advances has not been despicable, and now the conditions appear to be more favorable for the forward aggressive movement, apparently about to be undertaken with strength, and with considerable prospect of a favorable result.

The Russian military road, running southward from Warsaw through Radom and Kielce, to the frontier at Cracow, is at several points in man hands, and the loss of this line to the Russians, which is fully as important as the north and south railroads running westward, considerably affects the Russian movements.

If followed up by the seizure of the line running from Warsaw to Lublin and Kovel, it will make the Russian position in Galicia precarious.

The fighting in Galicia has not changed the positions there greatly during the past week. The Austrians are holding the Russians on the banks of the Nida River and along the Carpathians. In Bukowina, however, the Russians are making steady progress.

The center of interest on the eastern battle line is slowly but steadily moving eastward, from the Baltic seacoast to the line running from Rheims to St. Mihiel. It will be remembered that in the early part of the war, in August, in fact, it was in these columns that the crucial battle in France would probably take place within a few miles, comparable, speaking of Rheims, and the course of events since the assaults on Verdun, etc., having proved unsuccessful, to point to the revival of the effort at this point.

Naturally, from both topographical and strategic considerations, the key of Champagne seem indicated as the key of France, and in spite of a temporary departure from these historic battle lines, the indications today point to the course of precedent being followed after all.

Verdun, the Argonne forest and the Champagne plains are the three linked strategic points, the possession of which simultaneously after a probably determine the issue of the western campaign.

The early part of the week the fighting presented the usual characteristics: artillery duel, mingled with infantry skirmishes of little importance.

EARTHQUAKE BEREAVES ITALY

Copyright, Underwood & Underwood
COLUMN OF AURELIUS

ITALY again mourns the sudden death of thousands of her people by an earthquake which overthrew whole towns, and wrecked buildings in many places. The disaster occurred on the morning of January 13, the center of the shock being in the region between Sarno at the base of Mount Vesuvius and Campobasso to the north.

The extent of the territory affected is said to include Naples to the south and Ferrara in the north, a distance of over three hundred miles, and taking in the entire width of the country. Throughout this distance buildings have been overthrown, some towns entirely destroyed and a great many people killed, the actual number not being known at this writing—January 15.

Earliest reports put the total number who perished at twelve thousand and those injured at twenty thousand, but later reports increased the number to twenty thousand. Avezzano is reported entirely destroyed, a large portion of its twelve thousand inhabitants dead. This town was about eighty miles east of Rome and sustained the severest loss of any one place so far as reports indicate. Nine towns are reported as either destroyed or nearly so. In Rome, Naples and Tivoli much property was lost. Historic buildings were injured in Rome, and the column of Marcus Aurelius is said to have been broken and twisted by the violence of the shock, a great statue of St. Paul surmounting it being thrown out of position. Several of the noted churches also suffered minor damages.

The entire populace in the distressed region was thrown into wild panic by this sudden disaster. The shock lasted for several seconds and in some places the buildings continued to rock for half a minute. Scenes of great confusion followed: people rushed in all directions for safety, and in the cities fled in terror to the churches. For the most part survivors of the different towns spent the following nights camped out of doors in fear of recurrence of the shock. Communication with many towns was cut off. The government quickly instituted a system of relief work, and parties were speedily at work taking care of the thousands of injured and homeless and the bodies of the unnumbered dead.

This is the fourteenth time that Italy has been visited by a tragedy of this kind. The list of earthquakes, tidal waves and volcanic disasters is given by the New York Times as follows:

Date	Loss of Life
79—Bay of Naples (Pompeii)	2,000—5,000
1137—Sicily	15,000
1156—Naples	10,000
1626—Naples	70,000
1693—Sicily	100,000
1783—Calabria	30,000—50,000
1788—Calabria	1,000
1835—Calabria	2,000
1857—Sicily and Calabria	10,000
1857—Naples and vicinity	12,000
1905—Sicily and Calabria	3,000
1907—Sicily and Calabria	5,000
1908—Sicily and Calabria	77,287
1915—Rome and the Abruzzi	12,000

TIVOLI, WHERE MANY ARE SAID TO HAVE PERISHED

PROGRESS IN A GOOD WORK

FOR those who have been engaged in the Lord's work through years of trial and struggle, it is a comforting and delightful experience to look back and note how their souls have been blessed and how the work has gone on under their hands, even when they had least expectation of such results. This has been most markedly illustrated in the case of the China Inland Mission, which was founded a number of years ago, the funds for its establishment being contributed by generous Christian Herald readers. At the present time these orphanages, scattered throughout the great Eastern republic, are doing splendid service for Christ and humanity. There are in all twenty-four of these institutions, under the care of various denominations, including Methodist, Baptist, Presbyterian, Congregational, Advent, Friends, Mennonite and Free Methodist, besides the China Inland Mission, the Door of Hope and other undenominational ones. Originally 2,000, there are now over 1,000 children in these various orphanages who are supported by our readers. Many of the others are now actively engaged in regular Christian work—some as teachers, teachers, evangelists or Bible-men, while others are busy at useful occupations to which they were trained in the mission industrial schools. In a number of cases the boys have become self-supporting agriculturists. One mission has taught the girls to weave and spin, and the boys to raise poultry and do general farm work. In another mission the young folks have been trained in tea raising, and are pressing on bravely toward self-support. All the profit from the industrial work goes toward the support of the mission orphans.

The children themselves have not forgotten their kind patrons in far-off America. At the holiday season many greetings were sent by young protégés to their friends here. Best of all, a very large percentage of the boys and girls have developed into fine Christian young men and women, who love to serve the Master and to walk in his footsteps. "Thank God for leading me," writes a young student in Canton (formerly an orphan waif). "We cling to the faith. Some of our students are real Christians. We ask your prayers to pray for us and to ask God to grant his blessing in guiding us and converting all our students."

It is a beautiful and inspiring sight to witness the Bible class at study in almost any of the orphanages. Eager, earnest, wistful faces are turned toward the teacher. There is evidence of a deep desire to know the Gospel as it is presented in the Word. And not a few are becoming surprisingly good Bible scholars.

One of the missionaries writes from North China concerning his work. He has fifty-five children, supported by Christian Herald readers and their friends. A Chinese mandarin, named Fan En King, has been a generous patron of the work, and other natives have shown much interest. Thus the mission has not only enjoyed God's love and care, but has been a means of awakening spiritual interest in heathen hearts. As the missionary writes: "Even the heathen begin to believe we cannot be forsaken by Him." As an illustration of the power of Christian example he mentions that a Buddhist orphanage has been established nearby, which is using the same methods in caring for the orphaned, friendless children that the Christians have employed—excepting, of course, the Gospel teaching of the young.

Compassion Orphanage, Ningpo, is an example of the excellent work that has been done in many of the mission orphanages throughout China in sheltering and training the child waifs and developing their spiritual character. Rev. E. F. Knickerbocker, superintendent, writes, under a recent date, that there are about 70 orphan boys under care, 50 of whom are supported by Christian Herald patrons.

There are at least forty other applicants now clamoring to be taken into Compassion Orphanage, and if they could be received it would be a great blessing to the community. Meanwhile the native Chinese have become deeply interested in the child-saving and training work, and their appreciation is shown in voluntary contributions that are used to buy rice-growing lands, which will be a valuable help in the industrial and economic development of the mission. At present these lands support about twelve orphans. Mr. Knickerbocker adds: "Let me say to you, and to all your fellow-workers in this good cause, that we have great reason to feel grateful for all the Christian Herald and its readers have done. The work has done great good in the Ningpo field, and that is a large one. The six Protestant missions of this vicinity (the American Baptist, American Presbyterian, North, the Chinese Inland Mission, the English Methodist Mission, Church of England Missionary Society and an independent mission of ladies), and all the Chinese churches connected with them are taking an active part in sustaining the orphanage and in sending boys to it."

Now that the orphanage work is nearing a close, we cannot refrain from congratulating all who have had a share in this child-saving, soul-winning enterprise, which has been and still is productive of the richest blessing. Those who began with the work and who have loyally kept in touch with it all the way will not fail to stay by it to the end. There are several orphanages where the children must remain under care and tutelage for some time to come. There are others where patrons are needed to provide for children who are not yet supported. For these little ones we bespeak the consideration of our readers, and of their friends. Any names sent to the Christian Herald for enrolment as patrons of the orphans will be welcomed.

TRANSFIGURED LIVES

BY

"Be not conformed to this world: but be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind, that ye may prove what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God." (Rom. 7: 2.)

THE transfiguration of Christ was the glorifying of his earthly apparel and his human countenance with the radiance of the celestial world, so that the coarse linen of his garments and the lineaments of his face became resplendent above the brightness of the sun or the luster of any earthly robe. It tells us how these commonplace lives of ours may be so illuminated by the glory of God as it shines within that we shall reflect the light of heaven and let our "light so shine before men that they shall see our good works and glorify our Father which is in heaven."

Even so have we sometimes seen a little bit of broken glass shine with the radiance of some costly jewel, not because of its intrinsic value, but because the sunshine of heaven was reflected from it. So sometimes have we seen the sunset radiance reflected back from the lowly windows of some distant village that the humblest dwellings shone like celestial palaces and the whole landscape became transfigured with the reflected glory.

This is what the apostle means by transfigured lives. We are reminded that commonplace duty may be made sublime or inspired by the spirit of divine love and dedicated to the glory of God. The first saint described in the Old Testament lived such a transfigured life. Amid an environment of death and sorrow one illustrious name shines out with unique distinction, and yet with simple lowliness. "Enoch walked with God." He did not run some glorious race. He did not fly at some transcendent height. He did not achieve some heroic triumph. He simply walked, through three centuries and more, a commonplace path of faithful duty and fellowship. He "walked with God." The light of heaven illumined every step and the glory of translation was the climax of that transfigured life. His path was "as a shining light," shining "more and more unto the perfect day," until at last the portals of the sky opened to the earthly pilgrim and he was translated that he should not see death. And one of the latest pictures of the New Testament of the beauty and glory of sainthood is the portrait of some humble slaves to whom the apostle Paul sent an inspired message on the island of Crete through his epistle to Titus, whom he admonished so to live in their place of humble service that they should "adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things." The lives of these slaves were not only to be in harmony with the teachings of the Gospel, but to add a new luster to that Gospel and make it more attractive to their masters and the world around.

Blessings in Disguise

Our text suggests trial transformed to blessing. Here, again, there rises before our vision the picture of a man stooping under the burden of an overwhelming trouble. He has brought it upon himself, and it is the accumulation of years of selfishness, duplicity and overreaching at last about to bring their own retribution. An angry brother is waiting with his armed bands to meet him and his helpless followers with the dawning of the morning. He has exhausted all the resources of his own astuteness and contrivance, and at last in helpless despair he sinks upon his knees at the ford of Jabbok and cries for help to the God of his fathers. All night long the conflict lasts as he wrestles with the angel until at last the touch of God's mighty hand has shriveled his strength and left him prostrate and clinging at the feet of mercy. But a transfiguration has come and the vivid and poetic picture of the inspired description of his transformed life tells the story better than any words of mere description. How we can see the light shining around him as we read the story! "As he passed over Penuel the sun rose upon him." This was an eternal sunrise and a new morning. Henceforth he was no longer Jacob the Supplanter, but Israel the prince, the man that had power with God and therefore power with men. So still God leads his suffering ones through darkness to light.

We are next reminded by the figure of our text of suffering as the stepping stone to glory. And there rises before us another patriarchal picture, the son of Jacob and the supreme sufferer of the patriarchal story. The peculiarity about Joseph's sufferings was that they were innocent. Jacob deserved his trials and brought them upon himself, but Joseph was the victim of injustice, oppression and cruel wrong. How severe, how protracted that ordeal of suffering! The treachery of his brethren, the long banishment from his father and his home, the humiliation of a slave, the place of a drudge in the kitchen, the harder place of unjust accusation by the temptress whom he had spurned, a prison cell and a convict's punishment for things he had never done—all this is well described by the psalmist's vivid metaphor, "the iron entered into his soul." But at length the transfiguration came and suffering was transformed to glory and shame to honor. The highest place in the world was his recompense, but with his exaltation there came the higher distinction of a character unharmed by prosperity, a love that triumphed over wrong, and unselfishness that used his opportunities and honors only to bless the world and to heap upon the brethren that had wronged him the coals of fire of his forgiveness, his love and his blessing. Surely it was worth while, and some day it shall be worth while for us too; "for our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory."

Proving His Will

Misfortune turned to blessing. Again we find our Scripture type of this transfiguration. In the early chronicles of the Hebrew tribes we have a pathetic little story of a child born to an unwilling mother, whom in her disappointment she called Jabez, because, she said, "I bare him with sorrow." "Little Misery," as his name meant, came into the world under a heavy cloud. Nobody wanted him, not even his mother. And no doubt he was often reminded that he was an unwelcome visitor. Such an influence is most depressing and disastrous to any child. But little Jabez somehow found the divine remedy for all his troubles, for we read, "Jabez called on the Lord God of Israel, saying, 'Oh that thou wouldest bless me indeed and enlarge my coast, and that thine hand might be with me, and that thou wouldest keep me from evil, that it may not grieve me.'" It was as Jesus prayed that he was transfigured, and as Jabez prayed he was transfigured, too, for we read, "And God granted him that which he requested, and Jabez was more honorable than his brethren." The shadow of death was changed to the morning and the "bar sinister" became the badge of honor and success through answered prayer and transforming grace.

Temptation turned to triumph. The kaleidoscope changes again and we see four young men captives and exiles from their home in the great metropolis of the world. The sons of princes they are promoted to a place of honor among the students of Babylon. But they begin their career at once by refusing the luxuries of their high-born companions and being known as the humble, uncompromising servants of the God of Israel. It is not long until their second temptation comes. They have refused the smile of the world; now they must face its frown. Their loyalty to Jehovah is challenged. Will they compromise their principles, and for the sake of peace just make a form of bowing down to Nebuchadnezzar's golden image or cease to be seen praying with their faces toward Jerusalem? Not for a moment! Oh, how their transfiguration begins as their words ring out, "If it be so, our God is able to deliver us from the burning fiery furnace, but if not, be it known unto thee, O king, that we will not serve thy gods, nor worship the golden image which thou hast set up." And Daniel, the bravest of them all, with all the detectives on his track, boldly goes to the little sanctuary in his home, and with the windows opened toward Jerusalem prays and gives thanks to Jehovah "as aforetime." And the test comes with all its terrors, the fiery furnace and the lions' den. But that furnace only burns off their fetters and lights up the night of their transfiguration as the wondering watchers behold them walking amid the flames with One in their midst like unto the Son of God; while Daniel spends the night unscathed amid the hunger and sees his persecutors devoured by them as they reach the bottom of the den, while the conqueror of the world proclaims the God of Sh Meshach and Abednego and the God of Daniel to be above all other gods. So still there comes to every true heart the same twofold test, the trial and the crown of this hostile world, but that overcome the promise is unchanged, "Blessed is the man that endureth temptation, for when he is tried he shall receive the crown of life which the Lord hath promised to them that love him."

One more transfiguration scene appears as we read the inscription, "Out of weakness came strength." Back of it there lies the story of Jeremiah. Called to the hardest place, perhaps, that ever was assigned to mortal, he felt himself utterly overpowered by nature and temperament for the terrible judgment he was required to minister. "I am a child," he cried, "I am a child." But God did not let him from the awful task, but told him, "Be not afraid of their faces, for I am with thee to thee." And the timid, shrinking Jeremiah, a hero of faith and courage and stood unflinchingly through the fearful years of Jerusalem's siege, confronted the priests, the princes, the kings of Judah with fearless daring, at the peril of his liberty and life, and often amid the bitter persecutions, until at last his words of warning came true, and then God vindicated him in the glorious way. While the cowardly Zedekiah miserably perished and the compromising leaders of the nation fell under the Babylonian conqueror, Jeremiah passed immune through every peril and his sight of Jerusalem was most carefully guarded. The express commands of Nebuchadnezzar forbade while his name and memory were cherished by the countrymen to all later generations as the guardian angel of their city and their country, for when he appeared in their midst they have been saved through all the ages. Surely this was a transfigured life and reminds us still that humanness leaning upon God is clothed with omniscience.

His Power to Do

Pressure and difficulty are occasion for the sufficient grace of God. Once more we stand before a typical life. We see a man selected from the fellows to be a special object lesson of the many difficulties, pressures and trials that a human being could bear, so that he himself declares, "I know that God hath set forth us, the apostles, as examples, that we should be appointed to death. We are made a spectacle unto angels and principalities." And then read the story of his own peculiar sufferings, hardships, "In labors more abundant, in stripes above measure, in prisons more frequent, in deaths oft; Jews five times received I forty stripes save one; thrice I was beaten with rods, once was I stoned; thrice I suffered shipwreck, a night and a day have been in the deep, in journeyings of perils of waters, in perils of robbers, in perils by mine own countrymen, in perils by the heathen, in perils in the city, in perils in the wilderness, in perils in the sea, in perils among false brethren, in weariness and painfulness, in watchings, in hunger and thirst, in fastings often, in cold and nakedness." But does he murmur or complain? Listen. "If I must needs glory I will glory in things which concern my infirmities. Most gladly therefore, will I rather glory in mine infirmities, that the power of Christ may rest upon me. Wherefore, I take pleasure in infirmities, in reproaches, in necessities, in persecutions, for Christ's sake, for when I am weak, then am I strong."

Death, the stepping stone to life and glory. Sometimes even here the dying countenance is lighted up with the glory beyond and within, like Stephen's, the mortal face is as it had been the face of an angel, and the very glory of the life of man shines from the opened heaven. "For we do not yet appear what we shall be, but we shall be like him when he shall appear we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is." The transfiguration on Hermon is to receive its ultimate fulfillment in that glorious day when the Son of man shall

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR. LED BY REVS. J. H. JOWETT, D.D., F. B. MEYER, E. WHITTIER CASWELL AND DR. CLAYTON S. COOPER

The Sin of Forgetfulness

MONDAY, January 31. Deuteronomy 8: 10, 11. "When thou hast eaten and art full, then beware lest thou forget the Lord thy God." Forgetfulness is apt to breed forgetfulness. The multitude of our mercies may act like an opiate and make us heedless toward God. This is one of the subtlest perils. The bright day puts us to sleep. There are ten who can keep awake in the hour of Humiliation, with Apollyon in fierce temptation, to one who can keep awake on the levelled Ground, where the antagonism is found in the rarity of the air and the softness of the encompassing light. It is the luxuriant isle which seduces our Lotusland. We were all alert when we were driven by the stinging blast, and were in the grip of the engulfing deep. And thus it is true that the bright days bring forth the adder. A poisonous serpent lurks in our comforts. We are most in danger when we have no need. When we have everything we are in danger of losing God. All so does the Old Testament bid us "beware"; so does the New Testament bid us "watch!" The sentinels of the soul must be continually on guard, and never more so than when the battle seems to be over, and life has become a feast. Our vigilance must be exercised in deliberate vigilance when we have left the desert behind and have crossed the Jordan. We must open our eyes in resolute resolve to see the seal of the Lord on the mercies which crowd our way. No divine privilege must be allowed to pass as a personal right. On the forehead of every providence we must inscribe the name of the Lord. This must be our prayer: "When all thy mercies, O my God, my soul surveys!" And that healthy wonder will be accompanied by the spirit of praise. Then the songs of battle be sung again at the feast. J. H. J.

The Reciprocity of Friendship

TUESDAY, February 1. Isaiah 5: 1-16. "I looked that it should bring forth grapes." We are reminded of those words of our Lord: "Behold, as three years I come seeking fruit." The disappointments which God's love suffers in its dealings with us are enough to dishearten him from making further overtures to us; and we need seriously to ask ourselves whether we ought not to be reminded of responding to his yearning, seeking love. Notice, the point is not whether we are in Christian duty; but whether we yield our ripe, sweet fruit when he comes into the vineyard orchard of the soul. Can we confidently tell him, saying, "Let my Beloved come into my garden and eat his pleasant fruits," and does not reply, "I am come, I have gathered my myrrh, my spice; I have eaten my honeycomb with my honey"? Or, putting the tropical imagery of the Song of Songs aside, do we make a personal reference to the personal friendship of Jesus Christ? If friendship there must be reciprocity. You do not expect your friend to be always coming to you on requests that you should do this or that. Of us, there are times when his life may make a burden on yours; but for the most part, your relations with him are those of loving and familiar converse. You give him sympathy, tenderness, confidence, the expression of your heart, the fruit of your experience, the outcome of your thought. He uses it that he does not come in vain. But often in our quiet hours the Lord comes to us, in the wild waste of human rejection, for the purpose of our affection, and is sent empty away, or with wild grapes! F. B. M.

The Law of Truth in Daily Living

WEDNESDAY, February 2. Malachi 2: 6. "The law of truth was in his mouth." Malachi was one of the Old Testament prophets and his message was a warning against insincerity. He held up for priests the example of Levi, of whom he said, "The law of truth was in his mouth, and righteousness was not found in his life." The Bible abominates a lie; it makes the eternal verities of truth the necessity for permanent peace. Christ said and lived the principle that truth shall make you free. We do not read in the Bible that a man must live; we do read in it places that a man must be a disciple of truthfulness. "That you should continue to exist," said Dr. Louis Stevenson, "is a matter for your own consideration; but that your business should be first honest, and second useful, are points in which honor and morality are concerned."

In the home, in the church, in the state, in the business office, there is but one way to be truly sure of winning, and that is to be exactly truthful, whatever the consequences.

Between the soldiers' field at Cambridge, where the undergraduates gather in their athletic sports, and the ancient academic roofs of Harvard, there stands beneath a tree a simple marble shaft bearing the names of the men whom the field commemorates, while below the names are written Emerson's words:

Though love repine and reason chafe,
There came a voice without reply—
'Tis man's perdition to be safe,
When for the Truth he ought to die.

Whatever may be our religion, if it is of God, it will bear this sovereign word, "Truth," and truth is a big enough thing to die for. Let me speak truth, let me be the truth in the smallest detail of my work and thought, until it shall become in everything my habit, my law. C. S. C.

The Value of Chastening

THURSDAY, February 3. John 2: 12-25. "A scourge of small cords." This is very remarkable! Our Saviour is the Prince of Peace. His beatitude is on the peacemakers. His servants may not use force in the promulgation of his kingdom. But here, with his own hands, he makes a scourge by plaiting together the cords that were strewn on the pavement, and does not hesitate to use at least the show of force in driving the rabble from the temple court. Is it not legitimate to argue when flagrant wrong has been committed in God's temple—whether the temple is the body of a little child, or the rights of an unoffending people—that we are at liberty to go beyond the region of persuasion, entreaty and argument, and take in hand, reverently, thoughtfully, dispassionately, the scourge of compelling force!

Would that we were even quicker in applying the scourge to ourselves than to others! We are ready enough to scourge with our tongue or pen, whenever another has offended against some revered sanctity; but how apt we are to deal with considerable laxity when our own character or habit is concerned! Hence the necessity that we should endure chastening at the hand of our heavenly Father. "For whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth." God help us to go through the courts of the heart, detecting flitting dove-like fancies as well as bestial passions, and driving forth everything inconsistent with the purity and fragrance of God's sacred presence. F. B. M.

The Trusting Christian Does Not Worry

FRIDAY, February 4. Galatians 3: 6. "Abraham believed God, and it was reckoned unto him for righteousness." To really believe the promises of God and to follow them as best we can with his help should free us from worry and care, which according to physicians, cause more physical breakdowns than any other single influence.

A friend of mine, an old missionary in China, gave a Bible to a cultivated Chinese gentleman—a Confucianist—asking him to read it and then to tell him what he thought about it. After a few months he returned to the missionary and said, "I have read this book with great interest—it is a great book, and I am inclined to try these teachings; but," he added, "according to this book you are not a Christian!"

The old missionary, startled at this sweeping assertion, replied, "What do you mean?"

The Confucianist answered, "I read that a Christian is a man who is not handicapped by anxiety and worry, and is usually a happy man. He is one who knows that his God, who cares for the falling of the smallest bird, will surely care for him. This book commands him to cast his care upon God, and it assures him that he will receive the gift of peace. I read that Jesus said to his disciples that he gave them his joy, and he furthermore said, 'Let not your heart be troubled.' I find that a Christian is an unworried man. But you are the most worried man I know. You impress me as having a thousand cares. You are anxious about details concerning which, as these Gospels teach, you should trust God. You are not an unworried man. You are not a Christian."

The road to faith, according to the Bible, is, "Obey, then trust God." Abraham was obedient, even when he could not see the reason for God's command. Genesis 12: 1-5.

Do you realize that Jesus wrought virtually every miracle on this principle that men should believe? Do you realize that

Half of the ills we hoard within our hearts
Are ills because we hoard them and do not trust God to help us carry our fears and anxieties? C. S. C.

God's Love Shining Over All

FRIDAY, February 5. Ephesians 3: 1-11. "Might be known by the church, the manifold wisdom of God." What a wonderful glimpse this gives into the influence which our sin-stricken, sorrow-drenched earth has on the unseen universe! In great hospitals and homes of sickness it is often possible to find a group of students gathered around some bed of pain, where a renowned surgeon or physician is explaining the scientific causes of the complaint and indicating the cure. So it would seem from this wonderful sentence as though the highest intelligences of other worlds are watching our lives with intense eagerness and reverence. They attend us in our failures and need, as well as through the stages of our redemption and salvation; and they behold with adoring wonder the manifold wisdom of God in dealing with us, each according to a separate plan.

The Greek word rendered manifold is really "many-colored." Just as the pure beam of light is broken into the prismatic colors of the rainbow by the dark cloud, so, as the wise love of God comes in contact with the dark masses of human sin and sorrow, it is broken into a thousand lines of glory. We may put it thus, that though the holy beings of heaven see God's wisdom in suns and stars, they never would see its inner quality except in our human life, where all things are made to work our good and God's plan.

Is not this the reason why Job and Jeremiah suffered? May this not be one result of your suffering, when nobly and patiently endured? F. B. M.

The Abundant Goodness of God

SATURDAY, February 6. Matthew 7: 11. "How much more shall your heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to them that ask him?" Earthly parents, compared with God, are often ignorant, changeable, poor, weak, hasty, perplexed, depressed or wicked. The heavenly Father is never liable to such vicissitudes.

What a problem in proportion—"How much more!" As much more as the Creator is beyond the created; holiness beyond sinfulness; riches beyond poverty; as the ocean is beyond a dew-drop or the sun beyond a flickering taper. What a chasm between divine and human ability!

Think of God's overplus of power in nature—wasted winds, more than enough to turn all wheels; wild waters, more than enough to redeem all deserts. Think of the vast power in the sunlight, not yet corralled by man; of the infinitude of material wealth and beauty, which are only symbols of his endless spiritual riches; his power of atoning blood, of Pentecosts in his bosom, more than enough—baskets full left after all are fed. The heavenly Father gives from his royal bounty like a king, more than we can ask or think, exceedingly abundantly more, according to his riches which are in Christ Jesus. Then let us ask and receive that we may be filled with the Holy Spirit's power. E. W. C.

in the clouds of heaven and we shall be with him in his glory. Moses and Elias were but the types of the redeemed in that transcendent day when from the chariots of ascension and the open graves of earth ten thousand times ten thousand shall gather to meet him in the air, "when this corruptible shall put on incorruption and this mortal put on immortality, and then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory," and we shall prove in all its eternal fullness the meaning of the transfigured life.

A WEEK in the WORLD'S NEWS

READING MAKETH A FULL MAN, BUT NOT A FULL BOY. The children of families that are too poor to buy them sufficient food need no longer be hungry in the schools of New York. Twenty-four public schools in that city opened restaurants on January 13 to supply breakfastless pupils with a daily meal, consisting of biscuit, stewed fruit and chocolate. One hundred girl pupils of the cooking classes prepare the meal, while the older children act as waiters. Tickets are distributed free by the teachers to children known to be poor, while others who can afford to pay are served at cost. Should the experiment prove satisfactory, a large number of schools will adopt the new plan.

OLD AND NEW DAYS IN THE PHILIPPINES. Contemporaneous events reported from the Philippines include a successful raid by Kalinga head-hunters and the granting of a franchise to the first railroad built exclusively with Filipino capital and under Filipino management.

WHEAT NOW HAVING ITS DAY. On January 14 wheat sold for $1.45 a bushel in the Chicago market and for $1.48 at Portland, Ore., with minority holders of the crop waiting for two dollars before selling. Heavy purchases by Europe threaten to clean out the export capacity by the end of March, according to experts. Flour is beginning to rise in price. Switzerland, Greece, Italy, Holland and France are the chief foreign buyers at present; if the British Government is forced to enter the market the situation will be intensified. Scandinavian countries are also buying here, as Germany has shut down on rye exports. It is stated that German housewives are being urged by officials to learn and practice every possible method of food economy.

HEADING FOR THE CANAL. The official program for the formal opening of the Panama Canal is practically completed, seventeen battleships of the Atlantic fleet having been ordered to proceed to Guantanamo, Cuba, on January 17 for practice work, where other vessels will also assemble late in February, and all will then gather at Colon and pass through the canal to Panama, where they will arrive about March 3. Foreign war vessels are expected at Panama a few days later, and on March 5 the President will leave Hampton Roads on the New York escorted by the Texas for Panama. There will be no ceremonious parade of war vessels through the canal. On March 13 there will be a review of the fleet by the President, and most of the assembled vessels will then proceed to San Diego and then to San Francisco, to take part in the two expositions. At present, besides South American countries and Cuba, Spain and Portugal are the only foreign powers which are expected to be represented by naval vessels at the opening of the canal.

AGAIN! We have lost count of the number of times that Hayti has been torn by revolution, but enough remains of the country apparently to support one more such movement for the substitution of one party for another as the government, reports stating that leaders of the government recently overthrown by President Theodore are now making headway in a counter revolution.

7,056 CUBIC INCHES MAKE ONE BARREL. The House on January 13 agreed to a bill already passed by the Senate fixing a standard for barrels to contain fruits, vegetables and other dry commodities, and a special standard for cranberry barrels because of problems of packing. The standard barrel for general use must have a capacity of 7,056 cubic inches, and should be made of twenty-one-and-a-half-inch staves, seventeen-and-one-half-inch heads, the material not to be thicker than four-tenths of an inch. If the bill becomes law the penalty for on January 13 agreed to a bill already passed by the Senate fix-months. Foreign shipments are excepted.

ALL WOLVES' EARS MUST HAVE BURNED. Speaking before the twenty-first annual meeting of the New York Zoological Society on January 12 in behalf of the preservation of wild life in this country, Colonel Theodore Roosevelt declared the wolf to be the meanest of God's creatures, and endorsed the society's purpose to call upon the federal government for prompt action against the slaughter of wild game, excepting the elk of the Yellowstone Park, which, he stated, increase so rapidly that they would starve by thousands if not killed off.

BACK TO THE SOIL VIA COLLEGE. The recently retired governor of Maine, William T. Haines, upon the completion of his term of office registered as a student in the state university at Orono for the agricultural course, according to the Boston Transcript, the ex-governor being an alumnus, class of '76, having paid his way through the university by farm work; in more recent years application to his law business impaired his health and recourse to agriculture restored it: hence, etc.;

THEY WILL VOTE OR KNOW WHY NOT. Although for the second time within a year woman suffrage has received a setback in Congress, the leaders are nowise discouraged. They will reorganize their forces at once for another fight in the next Congress, and will keep up the battle to the end. It is conceded that many of them had hoped that the Mondell resolution would at least receive a majority, even if it fell short of the necessary two-thirds vote; but, even as matters stand, the vote more than fulfilled the expectations of many suffragists, being 174 ayes, 204 nos, a majority of thirty votes for rejection. It should be noted that equal suffrage, in the recent battle, was fought out more on the principle of its being a question within the rights of the states themselves, rather than on its own merits as a national proposition. This is held to explain the large democratic vote cast against it. A campaign of education to bring it out of the domain of the states and get it before the country on the broader ground will be a strong feature in the new plans of the suffrage party.

AMBULANCE SERVICE AT RAIL MEETINGS. Fifty thousand Philadelphians competing for the twenty thousand in the Billy Sunday tabernacle gave hundred and twenty-five police much more than they could do at recent meetings, and a score of women and girls and several men badly bruised as to require special treatment at the emergency hospital, a feature of the campaign. A detachment of nurses were on duty in the hospital, but at that meeting it was necessary to call for physicians from the city to help take care of the injured.

GREAT STORM ASSAILS NEW ENGLAND. One of the worst blizzards in history struck the New England coast on January 12, bringing death to four persons and destruction to many thousands of dollars' worth of property. Vessels were tied up in harbors and incoming ships were seriously delayed. The two days' wind attained a velocity of ninety miles an hour, and the velocity of wire was badly hit, and fish were blown off from the mainland were in great jeopardy, the sea rising to proportions of a tidal wave, presenting a terrifying spectacle of the beating of the gale.

GOOD FUEL FOR THE POOR. According to a news despatch, the brewery of Luzerne County, Pa., must have twenty-two thousand empty barrels for which the business has no use, the consumption of beer in that county last year as against 680,783 in 1913.

RUSSIAN CREDIT GOOD FOR $25,000,000 HERE. announced on January 14 that the Russian Government arranged with New York bankers, including J. P. Morgan, for an acceptance credit to the extent of $25,000,000, proceeds of the sale of the acceptances to be used in purchasing supplies here for shipment to Russia. The transaction is an indication of the shifting of the world's money from London to New York. A very recent shipment of a New York banking house direct from China (via San Francisco), the first instance of the kind, is another such indication in the opinion of financiers.

THE HAND THAT ROCKS THE CRADLE. One of the most remarkable and persistent fights ever made for woman's rights culminated in a full victory for the woman behind it on January 11 ruled that the New York City Board of Education had no right to remove Mrs. Bridget C. Piexotto because of her absence due to the birth of her child. Her reinstatement with back pay from April, 1913, was ordered. The decision is in favor of others than this teacher-mother, and is regarded as final under existing laws. A disposition on the part of some members of the city board to find a flaw in the case does not seem to have with favor by their colleagues. Legislation that would overturn this ruling for future cases of the kind may be so opposed by members radically opposed to the retention of teachers who become mothers.

THE PULSE OF BUSINESS. According to John H. Brown, president of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, organized by the National Commercial Conference in 1913, conditions in nearly all lines of business continue in steady improvement.

ENGLISH NEWSPAPER GIVES US PALESTINE. A serious suggestion has been made by the London Chronicle that certain eventualities of the war may force the United Kingdom to assume a "sort of" suzerainty over Palestine, even though the Jews should re-occupy the Holy Land as a nation, and food for many a speculative hour.

WHAT DID JULES VERNE TELL YOU? The new submarine approach yet to the prophetic dream of the author of the Thousand Leagues Under the Sea will be the submarine of the Navy Department has ordered built at the Fore River yard, Quincy, Mass. This, the largest vessel of its kind, will cost $1,350,000, will have a displacement of 1,000 tons, radius of action of 3,000 miles as against the 300 miles of the German U-9 type, which have been at work on the English coast, and a submerged endurance which is going to exceed the best that present submarines can do without coming up to breathe.

THE AIR TO BE ALL CLUTTERED UP. It appeared at a recent public address by Second Assistant Postmaster General Stewart that the department has mapped out aerial routes for some 2,000 mail-aviators who may be provided for the next session of Congress, if the postoffice authorities of their way, and that this manner of letter carrying will be in place within two or three years. On the same occasion an annual dinner of the Aero Club of America, the statement was made that the army and navy are preparing for rapid expansion of their aerial forces; and the Panama-Pacific Exposition management proposed a three-route transcontinental air starting from Boston, New York and Washington.

MY MAIDEN SERMON

AUTOBIOGRAPHICAL RECOLLECTIONS OF A MOMENTOUS EVENT IN THEIR MINISTERIAL CAREERS BY FIVE SUCCESSFUL AMERICAN PASTORS. COMPILED BY G. DOUGLAS WARDROP

MY FIRST sermons, or rather the recollection of them, is to most pastors a sensitive subject. To some, the memory seems like a long past but unpleasant nightmare. Many very amusing stories are told of this early ministerial experience, when the young and ardent theologian, confident of his ability to sway the multitudes, suddenly, on coming before an audience, finds himself terror-stricken and tongue-tied. Mr. Wardrop, in the sketches before you, gives some new and delightful reminiscences by well-known pastors. These form the first of a series of three articles that will be welcomed by our readers.—EDITOR.]

Sadder But Wiser

By S. Parkes Cadman, D.D., Pastor of the Central Congregational Church, Brooklyn

MY FIRST sermon was delivered when I was eighteen years old, and in a country farmhouse in Shropshire, England, and in the shadow of the stately Wenlock Abbey. The church in which this august event took place was provided with a generous supply of hams and flitches of cod with strings of onions strung from the rafters. The audience consisted of about fifteen farmers, five or six of their employers, and the miller of the little hamlet. I addressed them with what I thought to be considerable effect for about fifteen minutes, and no words of mine can describe the sensations from which I suffered during this short ordeal.

After the close a husky plowman asked me if I was a son of my father, who was also a preacher, and on my replying that I could claim that honor, he only advised me to send my father the next time I should find such a catastrophe as I had inflicted upon me that Sabbath afternoon.

This began my career as a preacher, and I walked several intervening miles to my home a sadder and wiser youth.

"Lo, I Am With You Alway"

By Rev. Ralph Welles Keeler, D.D., Methodist Episcopal Church, Pastor and Editor

DUBT if one ever forgets that first sermon. That is if he delivered it. And indeed one meets occasionally an individual who never forgets hearing his first sermon.

He came on a hot day in midsummer in a little Connecticut village. The pastor of the church had ended his vacation so as to get the cheapest possible substitutes. I was one of them. I have often wondered since whether the two dollars which he so generously gave me for taking his place overpaid me, or whether the sermon was worth more than the fee paid for my services.

It was during the summer just previous to my tenth the junior year at Tilton Seminary, Tilton, N. H., to prepare for college. Of course I could preach a great sermon. What young fellow at that age could not outpreach the learned divines who ministered forth from city pulpits? And I took a direct line in keeping with my confidence. Alas, I did not know just how to prepare the sermon after he had taken the text. As I look at it now, it was a sermon that needed considerable preparation, too, for my enthusiastic lack of knowledge I had chosen to preach from the words of the Master, "Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the ages." These were moments during those sixteen minutes when it seemed as though I had already preached a decade or two since I announced the text. To add to my embarrassment I discovered on entering the pulpit that the organist and the soprano were young ladies of my acquaintance "who had no idea that I was the one who was to fill the pulpit, although they had noticed that the name was the same." "To fill the pulpit" was a most unhelpful phrase. Rattle around in the pulpit would be appropriate.

I stared the face of my watch almost out of existence. Never did the second hand travel its minute course so slowly. Never did people seem so dull and uninspired as those who sat and listened listlessly to my pronouncement. Over and over did I assure them that the Master would be with them even unto the end. I wonder now if they thought I was giving them comfort for what they were enduring that Sunday morning. There was a feeling both of relief and added embarrassment when I finished. Relief that it was over, embarrassment of recognition that I had failed to outstrip the brilliant preachers in the nearby city. Then there was a certain bit of ambiguity in the comment of some of the people who "did not know that I could preach like that."

One may ask whether or not these maiden sermons stick in the minds of the people who hear them. Some six years later, during the spring of my senior year in college, I met a lady from this same church who was visiting friends of mine in the college town. When I was introduced to her, she responded very sweetly, "I have met Mr. Keeler before. I heard him preach." Now what preacher is not flattered that some one should have remembered hearing the wisdom which he spoke? Like a hungry fish rising for a worm, I replied: "And where was that?" "At ————" "Oh," I continued, "that was my first sermon." "I thought so," she replied, with a benign motherly smile, and then I realized how much the good people of our little churches endure for the sake of the kingdom in permitting themselves to be the material upon which young ministers may develop themselves for efficient work in larger fields of service.

Treat Sin as a Rattlesnake

By Rev. William Ashley Sunday, the Well-Known Evangelist

WHEN I first started out to preach I diagnosed the difficulty as being located in the gray matter. I said, "The bunch seems to be from Missouri, and I guess it's up to me to show 'em." So I got down the Encyclopedia Britannica, Webster's Unabridged, and all the authorities on high-grade English and rhetoric. I had some sentences so long and complicated it would make the jaw of a Greek professor squeak for a week after trying to pronounce one of them. But it never delivered the goods—it produced no more effect than shooting green peas against Gibraltar with a pop-gun.

Finally I said: "Lord, I think I have this thing doped out wrong. There's nothing the matter with any one except they have the devil in them." I loaded my old Gospel gun up with words, not so polished and elegant as those that come from the nickel-plated, copper riveted, homiletical, theological arsenal, but with common everyday phrases (which everybody could understand) and with rough-on-rats, barbed wire, ipecac, dynamite, and rock salt—I pulled the trigger and blazed away, and the feathers have been flying and the bunch have been hunting their holes ever since.

I think too much of the preaching nowadays is too nice, too pretty, too dainty—it don't kill. I find there is no use going to war on a skunk with cologne water—you've got to select your weapons according to the kind of game you are after. One reason why sin triumphs is because we treat it as though it were a cream-puff instead of a rattlesnake. A minister is God's artilleryman, and I purpose to keep firing away at iniquity and let others provide the Red Cross wagon.

A Heroic Resolution

By Rev. Abram Woodruff Halsey, D.D., Long-time Pastor Spring Street Presbyterian Church, New York, now Secretary, Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions

THE only item of interest in my ministry connected with sermons is the heroic act which I did after ten years of ministry. I found at the close of ten years of the pastorate in the old Spring Street Church—the only pastorate I ever had—in New York City, that I was falling into the habit, and a very bad one, because of numerous funerals and calls, of pulling out an old sermon and pretending to dress it up and give it in its new dress to a long-suffering and intelligent congregation. So one day, after heroic resolution and with many dire misgivings, I destroyed my entire stock of sermons which had accumulated during the ten years. I saved only one, known as the John the Baptist sermon, from the text: "Blessed is he whosoever shall not be offended in me." This sermon was chiefly notable from the fact that it was prepared in the seminary and preached some twenty times during the last year and a half of my seminary course. It had so many marks of times and places on it that I kept it as a sort of souvenir. It was a great thing for me intellectually to destroy the old lot of sermons, for I was forced every week to prepare new material, since I remained at the same church until I was called to be secretary of the Foreign Board.

Occasionally ministers would come down to the Old Spring Street Church, thinking, as it was a downtown church, almost any sermon would do. Once a young student occupied the pulpit when I was away speaking at a college. I asked one of the good Scotch women, of whom there were many in the congregation, how she liked the young preacher, and she replied: "He is young: he thinks that we do not know the difference between calf and beef, but we do."

The calf sermons were given to the flames. I commend it to all young preachers.

Thirty-six Years Ago

By Rev. Anson Phelps Atterbury, D.D., Pastor, Park (Presbyterian) Church, New York

THIRTY-SIX years ago is a long time through which to look back, yet I must go back thus far to reach that incident in my life which seemed all important then—and which still looms large in memory. Since that time, I suppose that I have preached many "maiden" sermons, in that they were innocent and innocuous, but that first important occasion rises in mind—like certain tender passages in many men's memories of youth.

I had just graduated from the seminary. I had done some sermon writing, and even some actual preaching, during the three years of seminary life. A small seaside Methodist chapel had claimed my service, without remuneration, for a couple of Sundays. I had preached with more zeal than discretion a number of times in a small mission in a manufacturing town. But all this was work under circumstances that in its smallness seemed hardly noteworthy; they were mere fledgling flights. The real maiden sermon was called forth by a father of the presbytery, the pastor of one of the leading churches in the city, an old friend of my parents, and thus interested in me. He insisted that I should preach for him in his church some Sunday afternoon during the springtime of my graduation. He was wise and I was foolish.

It was with a heavy heart that I faced the prospect. I have the record of text and subject, of date and place, an estimate of the size of the congregation, and a note of the particular occasion for the sermon—but I hardly need to look up the old record, for I can still feel my heart beating as the sexton helped me on with the robe, used by me for the first time, and as I painfully mounted the stairs into the pulpit. Once started, the nerves came under control and the whole self, physical and spiritual, seemed to rise to the occasion.

Kindly friends said afterwards that the service was more or less gratifying; careful relatives, anxious not to fill the heart of the neophyte with pride yet desiring to encourage him, tried to mingle praise with warning. But I needed and heeded little of human report concerning the maiden sermon. I had learned, at last, to swim. Many times since then I have come near drowning, metaphorically speaking; but always have I known that I could swim, after a fashion, when necessary.

It is sad that in human preaching, whether in one's maiden sermon or in one's more modern sermons, the human element should rise so conspicuously, even overpoweringly. Why cannot little men remember that in preaching and conducting divine service they are speaking for and with God—that their little selves are of very small importance? Such is human infirmity; yet the divine power can take a young man who is really in earnest and make him of some use as a servant of Jesus Christ. But I suppose the hardest work that God has to do is to eradicate self-consciousness from his servants.

Christianity Without Christ

DR. ELIOT, president emeritus of Harvard University, has attained deserved distinction as one of the leaders of thought in America. His utterances on great public questions have always commanded a respectful hearing. He has been credited with wisdom and moderation in his public addresses. Consequently it was with something of astonishment that people of all religious denominations have received the address he delivered in Philadelphia on December 29 last, in Witherspoon Hall, a building dedicated to Christian uses, maintained by Christian funds. All the forces of his keen intellect were brought to bear in an attack upon the Christian churches. Forever incapable of preventing war, he charged that they have frequently incited the nations to conflict. For half a century they have seen Europe planning to make war more and more destructive, yet they uttered no protest. And now they are wildly petitioning the Almighty to grant victory each to its own nation, forgetting the law of Christ that each should love his neighbor.

Upon these general assertions as a basis, Dr. Eliot rears a structure of accusations against the Church of Christ throughout the world that might have been worthy of an Ingersoll, but hardly of the head of an American university. The creeds of the churches he finds intolerable in ethics, the orthodox conception of God unworthy of intelligent human beings, the Gospel of redemption and salvation an unsatisfactory formula and the atonement an invention "revolting to the universal sense of justice and fair dealing." Progress and civilization are due not to the churches but to other influences.

While each of these statements is open to successful challenge, it is with the closing part of Dr. Eliot's remarkable diatribe that Christian America is most immediately interested. It is not the church but the teachings of Jesus Christ that are the target of his final shafts. After describing the divisions in the Christian Church over the present war, he asks: "Is this impotent condition the final issue of the teachings of Jesus Christ, or only the result of the structure of the institutions and the quality of the doctrines in which those teachings have been embodied and set forth?" To his own question he furnishes the reply that an immense multitude of men in both continents have no interest in such a discussion—that they have rejected "the traditional dogmas of established Christianity"; that "the vital movements of the human spirit have taken more promising directions." The growth of social service, the numbers who are ready to die for the cause of freedom, none of this self-sacrifice and devotion, he affirms, has been derived from the teachings of the Christian Church.

Dr. Eliot forgets that Christianity has been the great, indeed almost the sole inspirer of philanthropy and social service throughout the civilized world; that to it we owe practically all that is worthy and efficient in the great social movement conducted not only by our Christian associations and reform organizations, but in those concerted efforts that are now prevalent in every community, looking to the uplift and betterment of the lower social stratum. These have been energized by the Church of Christ. There is hardly a worthy movement in existence today which has not as a basis the religion taught by Him who "went about doing good."

Not only the church but the Sunday school comes under the doctor's oratorical castigation. It is of little moment to him that there are nearly eighteen millions in the Sunday schools receiving Christian training. To his view it is a picture of inefficiency. Marion Lawrance could present the Sunday school in a vastly different and more truthful light; but Dr. Eliot is not to be burdened with statistics.

Looking to the future, he gives his idea of a new Christianity "which abandons the errors and the unjust, cruel conceptions that the centuries have piled upon the simple teachings of Jesus." The new Christianity, he believes, will "reject all the aspersions on the natural life of man which it inherited from Paganism and Judaism." This, we presume, is his prophetic vision of the discarding of the Bible. Moreover, the new Christianity which he has in view "will recognize that the pursuit of happiness in this world is legitimate for every human being," and he points out that the germ of this is to be found in the "liberal churches" which "lay emphasis on character and conduct, and are concerned not with the belief of their members, but with their tendencies and purposes and daily actions."

There is nothing in Dr. Eliot's arraignment of Christianity and its Founder that has not been said over and over again by freethinkers, infidels and agnostics. What he presents in prospect is not, therefore, a "new Christianity," but an invitation to men to go out into the wilderness and leave all that makes life precious and gives it fulness of meaning and purpose, to join him and share his doubts and his unbelief. He talks of liberalism, yet he himself has shown an illiberal spirit. He assails the religion that is held dear by hundreds of millions throughout the world, and which has brought up from sin and degradation countless multitudes, raising them to faith and happiness and the great hope of a life hereafter. His religion, which he has defined as the pursuit of happiness, is one which offers no consolation to the sinner. It makes nothing of the divine Christ, his Cross, his atonement and resurrection and the plan of salvation. It is a creed of dust and ashes, a Christianity without Christ, the lifeless philosophy of a long-past age, which never did and never will satisfy the souls of men.

The Root of the Matter

THERE is one thing which the critics of Billy Sunday can neither deny nor explain—he does get people to turn about from lives of godlessness to righteousness and devotion. The daily papers of Monday, January 11, told of the nearly seven hundred converts who had been won at his first direct appeal to his Philadelphia audiences to "hit the trail" for the better life. All classes and ages were represented in these volunteers for Christ. "A poor old woman, with ragged-edged skirt and beshawled head, who touched Sunday's outstretched fingers, was followed by a young girl with earringed ears and jaunty aigrette in hat; a big broad-chested man, who looked as if he might be a brewer, was next; a little woman, with a crying baby in arms, was next. Two youths, fashionably dressed, with flowers in their buttonholes, were next. All were weeping."

In Mr. Sunday's mail, which mounts up to thousands of letters a week, are many affirmations of the determination to lead a new life and testimonials to grace received. After one of the Philadelphia meetings, an empty half-pint whisky flask was found in one corner of the auditorium. Tied to the neck of the flask was a bit of paper with these words: "This is my last drink." Best of all, Sunday's converts hold. Reports show that communities visited by revivals under his direction feel the uplift years after. The towns are cleaner, the churches more vigorous and fruitful. Crowds of former converts flock to a new city to help prepare the way and assist the conduct of a new campaign.

Evangelist Sunday is leading people away from sin and getting them acquainted with Christ. The root of the matter is in him and in his work. He should have the prayers and the support of all who believe that "he that winneth souls is wise" and that the turning of many to righteousness should be life's chief business.

A Government Book on Babies

THE accusation has often been made that the United States Government took pains to tell its people how to raise pigs and apples and other kinds of produce, but had nothing to say about the raising and culture of babies. But the government has at last purged itself from this reproach. A recent pamphlet, issued by the Children's Bureau, tells young mothers how to care for their babies, giving detailed instructions about almost every conceivable phase of infant life. The book is entitled "Infant Care" and is written under the direction of Miss Julia C. Lathrop, head of the Children's Bureau, by Mrs. Max West. Anyone who desires a copy may have it for the asking.

The book is practical, telling in everyday language the simple things which must be done for the child's proper development. The carrying out of the directions does not involve expense so much as care. In fact, it will save many mothers money that might have been spent in useless or harmful medicines. There are earnest warnings against dangerous patent medicines; the work does not pretend to take the place of doctor or nurse in times of sickness. But it tells how to keep the baby well, putting fresh air as almost the first essential. "Keep the baby out of doors," Mrs. West insists. "Begin when he is two weeks old to take him out for a few minutes every day, increasing the gradually till he is staying out most of the day."

It is sad to think of the little lives which have been sacrificed through the widespread ignorance of the needs of babyhood, particularly among the poor, who are not able to keep in frequent communication with physicians. The government has its real business in planning to save its infants and to lay for them the foundations of a healthy and sturdy life.

Hope for the Unemployed

THE mind of America is taking hold of the problem of unemployment with a new vigor. From Jeff Davis, who amazes New York by starting to equip a "Hotel de Gink," to Pinchot, who assails the personnel of New York's municipal committee on unemployment, and to Mitchel, who urges the Board of Estimates to set funds immediately available for setting New York's unemployed to work, and ex-President Roosevelt, who begins a lecture tour in the interests of the unemployed, and President Wilson, who advocates the formation of a Federal Bureau for bringing work and the worker together, the people are making a determination to do more than investigate the problem.

The situation in New York and other large cities has been appalling. It is vastly encouraging to find that men of influence and authority are coming to recognize the obligation of city, state and federal governments to provide employment for able-bodied, industrious men who are unable to secure it on their own account.

The old slogan of the tramp, "The world owes me a living," strikes a false note, because it is not the world but society that must care for him and support him. The man who will not work when work is available is a criminal. But the honest toiler, "The world owes me a chance to work, so that I and my family may not starve," is the cry of simple justice. America must heed that cry and answer it.

Comment by the Way

—AS AN OFFSET TO THE ILLITERACY of a considerable portion of our immigration, we may turn with some degree of satisfaction to the latest report of the United States Bureau of Education. It shows that illiteracy among children, native or resident, is steadily declining and that it is only a question of time when it must totally disappear. At the beginning of this century, 42 per 1,000 of all children over ten years of age could neither read nor write; in the first decade the rate declined to 22 per 1,000. Some states have made much more progress than others. Connecticut, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Montana, New Hampshire, North Dakota, Oregon, Utah, Washington and the District of Columbia have very nearly wiped out illiteracy among children of from ten to fourteen. This improvement, however, hardly reaches the adult population, among whom there are over 4,000,000 still classed as illiterate. This phase of the problem is being met by night schools, in factories and department stores, etc.

—BY A VOTE SUFFICIENTLY LARGE to assure repassage of the bill, the Immigration Bill passed the United States Senate on January 2. It had already passed the House. Incorporated in the measure as adopted is the "literacy test" for immigrants, which is opposed by many on the ground that it is a superficial and haphazard expedient that does not determine the real value of the immigrant or his eligibility to citizenship. Under such a test the hardy, honest toiler might easily fail, while the clever rascal would squeeze through, for it does not determine either true character or fitness. Had such a test been in force in former years, the nation would have been poorer by the loss of many who proved to be valuable citizens, and who materially aided in the development of the country. Mr. Taft's opposition to the Immigration Bill on account of the reasons indicated by President Wilson is understood to oppose it as being "the wrong thing in the wrong place."

—THE CONTINENT (PRESBYTERIAN) in a temperate and considered article under the caption "How Should a Protestant Treat Catholics?" makes this observation: "If any Catholic priest or layman individually shows signs of being less than a wholehearted American, then he ought to be watched, and any other person should be who, under political activity, is to be covering up some dangerous motive. It is not reasonable to assume just because the local priest is a papist that he is to vote his church solid at the election. But if he is attempting any of that sort of thing, he must be fought as fiercely as any other kind of political boss. A Protestant who in office would take orders from his pastor would be a disgrace. There is certainly every bit as good a reason for antagonizing any Roman Catholic aspirant who couldn't be counted on to refuse dictation from his priest." Which seems to put the whole matter fairly and squarely in a nutshell. It was precisely this sort of dictation, detected and very properly refused, which cost the Catholics the loss of several states in the election, New York among the number.

Church Ambassadors to Japan

REV. DR. SIDNEY L. GULICK and Professor Shailer Mathews, dean of the Divinity School, University of Chicago, sailed from San Francisco on the steamship Mongolia, for Yokohama, on January 2. They are on an errand, for they are taking a message of goodwill from the Federal Council of Churches of America, on behalf of the thirty constituent denominations, to the Federation of Christian churches in Japan. This is perhaps the first time in the history of Protestantism such a thing has ever been done. Dr. Gulick, who has been a prominent missionary in Japan for many years and has been home on a furlough, and Dr. Mathews have been in Japan from six weeks to two months. They will visit all the leading cities of that country on their errand of establishing relations of good will with the Christian churches of Japan and this country. How much better this kind of a mission than one of reckless war talk, which is calculated only to irritate both sides. The Japanese do not respect our country. The ambition of their leaders, especially the young men, is to master our language and copy our civilization. The missionaries of Japan, following the example and devotion of their predecessors, will yet save the land for Christ and the gospel of liberty and love. As in our mission fields, there is a lack of an ideal of Christianity and we can imagine how difficult and salutary will be the work of these ambassadors of God's will. With the ear of the hearer over the heads of serving followers of Christ we say: "My peace I give to you." (John 14: 27.)

Diamond in Turkey

WILLIAM MARKERT went down into Washington City, New York, and bought a turkey for three dollars. The butcher said to the purchaser: "I am a poor man like the gizzard I have do not. Shall I put it into the scales?" The man said yes. The butcher held it with his knife and dropped a diamond weighing about a carat. He took the diamond from his hand and said to the man who had bought the turkey: "I will give you fifty dollars for it, and you can have the turkey besides." The man would prefer to keep it, but he took home his turkey and the diamond gem, too. The bird is not known any better than the precious stone and the cheap pebble to be in grinding his grain for food. We sometimes find objects of great value in the most filthy and uncomely places. Out from the filthy mire there appears now and then a beautiful object, sparkling like a diamond—a lovely boy, girl, or man or woman, arising in thought, affection and service to honor and usefulness. Precious things are used as symbols of the graces that adorn the character; and the prophet calls God's beloved children jewels to be worn by him. "And they shall be as the Lord of hosts, in that day when I keep my jewels." (Mal. 3: 17.)

Gilded Ball Was Iron

LED by the high price of copper, John Mossop, a steeplejack and contractor, saw a treasure in the gilded ball on the condemned steeple of the old Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia. When he reached what he had sought as a ball of copper, valuable, he found it was only iron. Mossop and four steeplejacks had worked for five days climbing the tall spire of the church. Then with a chain tackle and a "gun-pole," the gilded ball, six feet in diameter and weighing several hundred pounds, was let down to the street. Then Mossop discovered that the gold leaf was laid on galvanized iron. The ball was made fifty years ago, before machinery was made to spin such a ball from the metal, and it was made from strips riveted together and supported from within. It is no new thing to be deceived by iron covered with gold leaf to make it look like a precious metal. There are enterprises in life that appear to be gold, but when found they prove to be very cheap iron. They are sometimes called "gold bricks." There are some people who glisten like gold at the top of the steeple, who are really quite common metal. Fortunately, there are many sincere men and women and Christians who are just what they seem to be; who are made of good timber, not like worm-eaten wood concealed with a thin cover of veneering, nor like a ball of iron covered with the gold leaf of pretense or hypocrisy. The gilded iron ball on the top of the church steeple is in contrast to the qualities of pure gold used in the first temporary house of God and afterward in the temple: "And thou shalt make a mercy seat of pure gold." (Ex. 25: 17.)

HONOR FOR NAVAL HEROES

SECRETARY OF THE NAVY JOSEPHUS DANIELS on January 6 presented medals to fourteen men for conspicuous bravery during the invasion of Vera Cruz. All of the men belong on the dreadnought Florida. The presentation ceremony took place on the deck of that ship in the Brooklyn Navy Yard. The personnel of the American navy, always good, has improved very much in recent years. The bravery of our soldiers and sailors has been one of the proudest records of our nation's history, and the whole country has a pride in these prizes bestowed, and congratulates the heroes receiving them. Life is one great conflict for the protection of our homes, the community and the country, and bravery and loyalty to the interests we serve are necessary. There are battles to be fought with spiritual foes, and loyalty to God, and courage in overcoming his enemies are necessary to victory in this service. One of the greatest warriors against moral evil thus describes the prize that is awarded to those who have faith and bravery in the service of the Master: "I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus." (Phil. 3: 14.)

Would Neither Work nor Hunt

FRANK PETERS was found in a starving condition the other day in a shack a few miles down the Taquamenon River, Wisconsin. It was at first thought that his weakness was the result of a malignant disease of some kind, and they took him to Marinette for treatment. They gave him two substantial meals. The next day he was discharged as well. The medical officer made this report: "Was starving to death; too lazy to work or to hunt." This was putting it very strongly. Many have been too indolent to earn a decent living or food for sufficient strength. Few, however, have been too lazy to hunt. The man who was starving because he was too indolent to go to the woods, so full of game, must have been close to the extreme limit of laziness. The church has a splendid company of industrious men and women. There are some who get easily tired at religious exercise, and some are to be found who are literally starving spiritually because they are too lazy to work. Even the lighter, the amusement, side of church life does not appeal to them, does not arouse them from the fatal lethargy into which they have fallen. There is this faithful picture of the lazy man: "Yet a little sleep, a little slumber, a little folding of the hands to sleep: so shall thy poverty come as one that travel-eth." (Prov. 24: 33, 34.)

Marshall P. Wilder Dead

MARSHALL P. WILDER, the noted lecturer, entertainer and humorist, died in the city of St. Paul, Minn., January 11. He was born in Geneva, N. Y., September 19, 1859. His physical disability prevented him from having an education higher than a few terms in the public schools. He began life as a pedler and later served as a clerk in an office. In 1880 he took up his work as an entertainer. In 1883 he filled an engagement in London, having in his audience the Prince of Wales, afterward King Edward VII, and for sixteen consecutive years he entertained audiences in that city. Wilder, while hardly in the class of America's greatest humorists, had genius. He overcame handicaps which would have held down a weaker spirit, laughed himself into the notice of America and the world, and lightened and brightened the hearts of thousands by his healthful fun, wit and humor. The Book that understands the heart better than all others said there is "A time to weep, and a time to laugh." (Eccles. 3: 4.)

Riis and Indian Woman

THERE is a beautiful story going the rounds of the press about the gift of an old Indian woman, and the action of the late Jacob Riis concerning it. A very small old Indian woman crept into his office one evening during the holiday season and laid a little soiled package on the table, saying, "For some little one, maybe," and then went down the stairs. Mr. Riis opened the package and brought to view an infant's frock of red flannel, so worn, so mended, so shrunken as to measure only about twelve inches in length. It was all she had to give, and she thought it might keep some poor baby warm. Mr. Riis followed her several blocks away to a poor hovel, and knocking at the door, said he had come to ask her what she wanted as a holiday gift in return. She said, "A bird with bright feathers, that can talk." He was about to sail for Denmark to visit his mother. That night one newspaper contained the following advertisement: "If some one will give a pretty parrot, who talks well, it will make an aged and lonely woman very happy. Send to Jacob A. Riis." The next morning there were six birds awaiting his approval. He found time to select one to be sent to Onna-Yuga, the old Indian woman. When he came back from Europe he went around to her room and saw her lying on a little bed with Polly on her shoulder, his head tucked in Onna-Yuga's neck, both fast asleep. This poor old Indian woman had given the dress of her own child, rich with precious memories, to keep some poor baby warm in winter, in imitation of the woman of whom Christ said: "But she of her want did cast in all that she had." (Mark 12: 44.)

Was a Real Benefactor

MR. CHARLES M. HALL, who died the other day, made a discovery which led to the perfection of a process that made aluminum a commercial commodity. At the time of this discovery aluminum had sold as high as $5 a pound; as the result of the new invention the price fell to fifty cents a pound. This large contribution to the industrial world by the genius and ingenuity of Mr. Hall was rewarded with a fortune reputed to be $5,000,000, most of which he bequeathed to educational and religious institutions. Among them was a gift to Oberlin College, of which he was a graduate, of $1,000,000. Mr. Hall, during his life, gave to a wide range of benevolences. Entering the other life with Christian faith, he could take up the words of the apostle: "For to me to live is Christ, and to die is gain." (Phil. 1: 21.)

IN THE WAKE OF THE AUTOMOBILE

SOME seventeen years ago there were no automobiles. Maybe it was nearer twenty years. Like as not it was eighteen and a half. Anyway, you and I can easily remember those days. Great days, too, and don't you forget it! . . . Well, another time we can get together and talk about those good old days; just now we shall have to stick to the text that the Editor laid down for me.

The Great Change began, I feel sure, about the year 1894. About that time automobiles began to be turned out as a regular commodity, and you and I began to quarrel about how to pronounce the word. Remember? "You're all wrong, Jim; it's auto-MO-bile." "Nothing of the sort; the word is automo-BEEL!" "Oh, get out; here, see what Webster—" But before we became fully estranged a genius came along and said, "Pshaw! call 'em cars"; and so cars it is. (But, really, Jim, the right way to pronounce it is auto-MO-bile; now isn't it? What! You still say it ought to be automo-BEEL? Say, don't you know any—)

We were speaking of the Great Change. It was a gradual alteration of all our relations in life, but very definite. One by one as the years rolled on, this and that neighbor got a car and knew us no more as bosom friends. Remember? We felt awkward in the presence of these fortunate ones, like ignoramuses who have never been abroad, in the presence of some city fellow visiting the Wilcoxes just after a summer in Italy. We tried to act at ease when a former acquaintance happened to stop his new runabout at the curb where we were idling. We'd saunter near, look her over knowingly, lay a hand nonchalantly against the lustrous side, cross one leg over the other, push our hat to the back of our head and ask him how the little old mowing machine was acting nowadays. "Seen Fred's new one?" we queried, indifferently. "Nice little car, that." Or we showed intense interest in our former friend's car's tires, hubs, axles, steering-wheel, levers, lamp, crank, and what-not, asking all kinds of learned questions that neither he nor we understood. For the day had not yet come when the vocabulary of the automobile stood out in the English language like a sore thumb on a pianist's hand.

And so, little by little, the new aristocracy came into existence in America, and a new and never-to-die ambition laid hold on every man, woman and child, not in that aristocracy, to own a car. And when it became apparent that the nation was getting that longing, do you remember how the automobile factories sprang up in a night? And how every town and hamlet struck a vein of gasoline? And how every blacksmith and dealer paid off the old mortgage on his little white cottage? (And now he is trying to put a new one on so he can buy the family a car. Or, at least, so they say.)

Running your 60-h. p. "six" to the turn of the hill and bringing her to a full stop, and then standing up and looking back along the way the automobile has traveled to its present eminence in American life and the world's industry, you see down a vista of these seventeen or so years and are amazed at what you behold. You are amazed at the objects that once made the bystander gasp with suspicion of the honesty of persons who could own such magnificence just for pleasure. You are amazed at the still stranger objects with which maker after maker sought to supplant what had already been put on the market by something a bit better: a custom among makers which has persisted somehow ever since. You are amazed by the sudden increase in the number of cars in use year after year, and by the over-night production of a hundred types of car, and by the kingly prices charged, and then the princely and then the gentlemanly and then the common-sense. And while you stand there with your mouth hanging open in amazement, suppose I just tell our friends here what you are gazing at.

WELL, our friend there who is gazing back along the way the automobile has traveled sees a path that very much resembles a flattened funnel, or, better still, a turnip with a very long tap-root. And that long slender tap-root reaches back into the centuries, and I am not sure that it doesn't even take hold on Bible times, for I seem to recollect some allusion in the prophets to the day of the horseless vehicle. I shall be glad to be corrected if this is an error.

At any rate, the notion took hold of men several centuries ago that it would be practicable to make road vehicles carrying their own power, and if our friend's vision is keen enough he will perceive along quite an extent of that tap-root the results of many experiments in this direction.

I think there is no record of anything worth while having been accomplished until the beginning of the nineteenth century, when, in the year 1802, a road vehicle was made in England, propelled by a steam engine; and the only thing worth while about it was that it stimulated endeavor. About thirty years later, a number of steam-driven stages or omnibuses were put out in England and threatened to become a permanent addition to vehicle travel. "Threatened" is the correct word, for if accounts are true those unwieldy, cumbersome road engines were most unpopular with the populace, who thought they saw in them an early elimination of the horse with all the pleasure and comfort that faithful beast was giving. So popular will discouraged the new industry by imposing exorbitant tolls for the use of the highways, requiring a maximum speed of about four miles an hour and the precaution of having a red flag carried on ahead of each rumbling mastodon.

This is bringing the observer's gaze rather far along that tap-root of the industry, and he can easily perceive that in America serious attempts were being made about this same time to produce a practical self-propelled road carriage. For the best part of that century America and Europe kept at it, nip and tuck, the tap-root part of the path of the automobile beginning to thicken out toward real growth.

One of the most conspicuous things our friend on the hillside sees, as he looks back at that point in the automobile's course, is a smile of disdain on the public countenance. The pioneers of this industry were freaks to their generation. It was quite evident to the public that a practical horseless road vehicle could never be obtained. The inventors, who were on the track of the coveted prize, looked like so many men lost in the intricacies of a maze. New problems confronted them at every turn. Questions of fuel, the method of converting it into motor power, how to apply the power and regulate it, and similar problems—simple enough, now that they are successfully solved—were among the most difficult that faced these pioneers. It has been pointed out, for example, how the early inventors wrestled with the question of gearing the wheels to the engine so as to obtain a gradual transmission of the power, for it was soon found that the gasoline engine starts full speed, and to start any vehicle at full speed would simply mean to distribute its occupants hither and yon. So out of this one difficulty has grown the science of the clutch. Today enthusiasts talk clutch in their sleep.

THE AUTOMOBILE

But presently that smile of disdain was changed to an expression of bewilderment, for along toward the close of the nineteenth century gasoline-driven road wagons, carrying passengers, began to strut about our highways, thumbs in the armholes of their vests, with a sort of an "I-told-you-so" air about them.

That is one of the most interesting spots our friend up there will see along the entire path of the automobile. It marks the merging of the tap-root into the big, swift-growing, juicy, golden-yellow turnip. It marks the end of empiricism in automobile building and the beginning of competition. It spells ostracism to the horse and a new era for the human race.

That spot is only about a year or two long. It is recognized by rows of horses sitting tremblingly on their haunches in village gutters watching out of blood-red, dilated eyes, buggies and runabouts and coupés whiz by with no horses to pull them; and by small boys racing along to see these strange craft come to grief and to hear the strange words the drivers thereof will utter from underneath their new-fangled wagons; and by sedate humans wondering what we are coming to next; and by impromptu debating clubs at every corner and in every barber shop, wrangling over the fact, apparent enough to sensible men, that the new invention could never become of commercial importance.

And just this side of that spasm in the career of the automobile, our friend beholds what is certainly one of the marvels of the industrial world, if not indeed of civilization itself—the instantaneous development of the automobile industry. For a business that can reach world proportions and change the customs of a nation's life within a period of, say, twenty years, must be said to have developed like spontaneous combustion.

Come to think of it, "spontaneous combustion" is good. The industry expanded on all sides at once. While the snug little family car sprang into the cozy tonneau style, keeping endurance first in mind, the racing car burst forth on every highway to set the standard for speed. Simultaneously, keen makers combined the excellencies of both and produced the seventy horse-power, long distance family touring car. The low-powered makes then fell naturally to the light delivery work of business houses, and the slow and small family tonneau style car became the ideal pleas-sure car of the farmer. Special uses brought forth special classes of car, the two-seated physician's runabout being a huge favorite. The success of the light delivery wagon led to the adoption of the powerful delivery trucks, mighty engines of modern commerce, and the American farmer woke up to the possibilities of motor wagons and motor trucks for big farming and to the economy of motor-driven threshers and reapers and incubators. Perhaps not incubators yet. Our farmers even began to hitch up one hind wheel of their pleasure cars, like a cow about to kick over the pail, attached belts to it and their grindstones, and, presto, a new use for the automobile.

Without pausing to take breath the big family touring car begot the elegant limousine and the dainty coupé to take turns with it in the service of the wealthy, and then turned a double somersault and came down in two classes, the high-priced, high-power, high-and-mighty car of the ultra rich and the same thing under a thinner coat of varnish for the substantial business and professional man.

KEEPING pace with all this there sprang into existence a big business in the invention and manufacture of "parts" to eke out the automobile owner's meager list of upkeep expenses. At once America realized its lack of foresight in not having planted rubber trees early in its history. The night became hideous with competing horns, each one warranted to reduce any pedestrian to a state of abject fear by its first blast. A new grade of oil was perfected almost every other hour. Gasoline became the most coveted commodity of earth.

The path of the ever-advancing automobile spreads so wide as it gets near to where our friend stands in his car with his mouth still hanging open in amazement, that he simply cannot see it all at one time. To do so he would needs take in at one glance the taxis in the streets of St. Louis and the armored automobiles along the Vistula River, the two million cars of over five hundred different designs in the United States today and the one hundred and nineteen great plants that make them, the countless separately sold essentials and the rivers of gasoline and oil, the armies of workers employed in the manufacture and selling and driving of automobiles and the thousands of miles of highway connecting almost all our cities and big towns and our coasts and maintained in the interests of automobile travel.

And even if he could sweep all this into one glance, he would not see the whole development of the industry. For one thing, he would not see the modern Santa Claus swinging through the air in a magic car, Ditzel and Blitzen forever myths of the past. He would not see the realms of fiction and of magazine articles and of books of travel built up around the automobile. And he would miss the glorious rivalry of the manufacturers in the advertising columns of the press and periodicals of the land.

I might even have to tell him that the day of the reasonable-priced car has come. That standardization of most classes of cars is now so well established that selections are made chiefly because of this or that fine point in equipment or finish or body lines. That some half million cars were sold by American makers in 1915, and that the index of the present season's annual shows points to the biggest year yet in the industry and to the most prosperous year in all the business life of our great land.

When an industry actually makes for the prosperity of a nation, it may well be looked upon with pride. When a nation turns to and helps make the prosperity of an industry, that industry, forsooth, may well consider how it can best put itself at the service of the greatest number in that nation.

I guess I'll just let our friend stay where he is and enjoy his retrospect. Sorry we could not get in a word about old times. Some other time, what do you say to getting together and having a downright good chat about the days before the autoMobile? Good old days those, but, after all . . .

EUROPE'S GREAT NEED

New Contributions to the Relief Fund

THE interesting article by Dr. Clark on page 71 of this number directs attention anew to that other vast scene of suffering caused by the war in Poland. And this but emphasizes how real is the need for continuous help from America. It seems as though these beligerent countries almost take it for granted that the humanitarian work called for by the war will be taken care of by this country.

It is stated in the press that relief work in Belgium alone has called into existence a regular steamship service between the United States and Rotterdam, 31 vessels running on schedule time to transport the supplies given by generous-minded America. This huge charity is automatically falling into systematic methods, one example of this being the gathering of cargoes by individual states as state gifts.

It still remains the distinctive work of the Christian Herald Family to direct its generosity to the relief of women made widows and children made orphans by the war. Your fund on January 14 amounted to $111,679.56 and ninety thousand of this has already been apportioned to the distressed districts. We are awaiting definite word and special information to enable us to release more of the fund for actual work. We know of no more worthy cause for the gifts of those who feel they are able to do something this winter for the distressed of the earth. Please address all gifts to the Widows and Orphans Fund, Christian Herald, Bible House, New York City.

Total receipts to January 14, $111,679.56, not all acknowledged in the Christian Herald as yet. Acknowledgments will continue each week.

CHAPTER XII

FROM BEHIND A COUNTER

MRS. CAREW was very angry. To have brought herself to the point where she was willing to take this lame boy into her home, and then to have the lad calmly refuse to come, was unbearable.

Mrs. Carew was not in the habit of having her invitations ignored, or her wishes scorned. Furthermore, now that she could not have the boy, she was conscious of an almost frantic terror lest he were, after all, the real Jamie. She knew then that her true reason for wanting him had been—not because she cared for him, not even because she wished to help him and make him happy—but because she hoped, by taking him, that she would ease her own mind, and forever silence that awful eternal questioning on her part: "What if he were her own Jamie?"

It certainly had not helped matters any that the boy had divined her state of mind, and had given as the reason for his refusal that she "did not care." To be sure, Mrs. Carew now very proudly told herself that she did not indeed "care," that he was not her sister's boy, and that she would "forget all about it."

But she did not forget all about it. However insistently she might disclaim responsibility and relationship, just as insistently responsibility and relationship thrust themselves upon her in the shape of panicky doubts; and however resolutely she turned her thoughts to other matters, just so resolutely visions of a wistful-eyed boy in a poverty-stricken room loomed always before her.

Then, too, there was Pollyanna. Clearly Pollyanna was not herself at all. In a most un-Pollyanna-like spirit she moped about the house, finding apparently no interest anywhere.

"Oh, no, I'm not sick," she would answer, when remonstrated with and questioned.

"But what is the trouble?"

"Why, nothing. It—it's only that I was thinking of Jamie, you know—how he hasn't got all these beautiful things—carpets, and pictures, and curtains."

It was the same with her food. Pollyanna was actually losing her appetite; but here again she disclaimed sickness.

"Oh, no," she would sigh mournfully.

"It's just that I don't seem hungry. Some way, just as soon as I begin to eat, I think of Jamie, and how he doesn't have only old doughnuts and dry rolls; and then I—I don't want anything."

Mrs. Carew, spurred by a feeling that she herself only dimly understood, and recklessly determined to bring about some change in Pollyanna at all costs, ordered a huge tree, two dozen wreaths and quantities of holly and Christmas baubles. For the first time in many years the house was aflame and aglitter with scarlet and tinsel. There was even to be a Christmas party, for Mrs. Carew had told Pollyanna to invite half a dozen of her schoolgirl friends for the tree on Christmas eve.

But even here Mrs. Carew met with disappointment; for, though Pollyanna was always grateful and at times interested and even excited, she still carried frequently a sober little face. And in the end the Christmas party was more of a sorrow than a joy, for the first glimpse of the glittering tree sent her into a storm of sobs.

"Why, Pollyanna!" ejaculated Mrs. Carew, "what in the world is the matter now?"

"N-n-nothing," wept Pollyanna. "It's only that it's so perfectly beautiful that I just had to cry. I was thinking how Jamie would love to see it."

It was then that Mrs. Carew's patience snapped.

"'Jamie, Jamie, Jamie!'" she claimed. "Pollyanna, can't you stop talking about that boy? You know perfectly well that it is not my fault that he is not here. I asked him come here to live. Besides, where that glad game of yours? I think would be an excellent idea if you would play it on this."

"I am playing it," quavered Pollyanna. "And that's what I don't understand. I never knew it to act so funny. Why, before, when I've been glad about things, I've been happy. But no about Jamie—I'm so glad I've got carpets and pictures and nice things to eat, and that I can walk and run and go to school, and all that; but it's harder I'm glad for myself the sorrier I am for him. I never knew the game to act so funny, and I don't know what ails it. Do you?"

But Mrs. Carew, with a despairing gesture, merely turned away without a word.

It was the day after Christmas that something so wonderful happened that Pollyanna for the first time almost forgot Jamie. Mrs. Carew had taken her shopping, and it was while Mrs. Carew was trying to decide between a dresden-lace and a point-lace collar, that Pollyanna chanced to spy farther down the counter a face that looked vaguely familiar. For a moment she regarded it frowningly; then, with a little cry, she ran down the aisle. "Oh, it's you—it is you!" she exclaimed joyously to a girl who was peering into the showcase a tray of pink bows. "I'm so glad to see you!" The girl behind the counter lifted her head and stared at Pollyanna in amazement. But almost immediately her dark, somber face lighted with a smile of glad recognition. "Well, well, if it isn't my little Public Garden kiddie!" she ejaculated. "Yes, I'm so glad you remembered," beamed Pollyanna. "But you never came again. I looked for you lots of times." "I couldn't. I had to work. That was our last half-holiday, and— Fifty cents, madam," she broke off, in answer to a sweet-faced old lady's question as to the price of a black-and-white bow on the counter. "Fifty cents? Hm-m!" The old lady fingered the bow, hesitated, then laid it down with a sigh. "Hm, yes, well, it's very pretty, I'm sure, my dear," she said, as she passed on. Immediately behind her came two bright-faced girls who, with much giggling and bantering, picked out a jeeled creation of scarlet velvet and a airylike structure of tulle and pink bus. As the girls turned chattering away Pollyanna drew an ecstatic sigh. "Is this what you do all day? My, how glad you must be you chose this!" "Glad!" "Yes. It must be such fun—such lots of folks, you know, and all different! And you can talk to 'em. You have to talk to 'em—it's your business. I should love that. I think I'd do this when I grow up. It must be such fun to see what they all buy!" "Fun! Glad!" bristled the girl behind the counter. "Well, child, I guess if you knew half—that's a dollar, madam," she interrupted herself hastily in answer to a young woman's sharp question as to the price of a flang yellow bow of beaded velvet in the showcase. "Well, I should think 'twas time you told me," snapped the young woman. "I had to ask you twice." The girl behind the counter bit her lip. "I didn't hear you, madam." "I can't help that. It's your business to hear. You are paid for it, aren't you? How much is that black one?" "Fifty cents." "And that blue one?" "One dollar." "No impudence, miss! You needn't be so short about it, or I shall report you." "Let me see that tray of pink ones." The salesgirl's lips opened, then closed in a thin, straight line. Obeyingly she reached into the showcase and took out the tray of pink bows; her eyes flashed and her hands shook visibly as she set the tray down on the counter. The young woman whom she was serving picked up five bows, asked the price of four of them, then turned away with a brief: "See nothing I care for." "Well," said the girl behind the counter in a shaking voice, to the wide-eyed Pollyanna, "what do you think of my business now? Anything to be glad about there?" Pollyanna giggled a little hysterically. "Why, wasn't she cross? But she was in a funny, too—don't you think? Now, you can be glad that—that aren't all like her, can't you?" "Suppose so," said the girl, with a smile. "But I can tell you right off, kiddie, that game of yours you tell me about that day in the garden may be all very well for you, but—" Once more she stopped with a grin. "Fifty cents, madam," in answer to a question from the other side of the counter.

"Are you as lonesome as ever?" asked Pollyanna wistfully, when the salesgirl was at liberty again. "Well, I can't say that I've given more'n five parties, nor been to more'n seven, since I saw you," replied the girl so bitterly that Pollyanna detected the sarcasm. "Oh, but you did something nice Christmas, didn't you?" "Oh, yes. I stayed in bed all day with my feet done up in rags and read four newspapers and one magazine. Then at night I hobbled out to a restaurant where I had to blow in thirty-five cents for chicken pie instead of a quarter." "But what ailed your feet?" "Blistered. Standin' on 'em—Christmas rush." "Oh!" shuddered Pollyanna, sympathetically. "And you didn't have any tree, or party, or anything?" she cried, distressed and shocked. "Well, hardly!" "O dear! How I wish you could have seen mine!" sighed the little girl. "It was just lovely, and— But, oh, say!" she exclaimed joyously. "You can see it, after all. It isn't gone yet. Now, can't you come out tonight, or tomorrow night, and—" "Pollyanna!" interrupted Mrs. Carew in her chilliest accents. "What in the world does this mean? Where have you been? I have looked everywhere for you. I even went 'way back to the suit department." Pollyanna turned with a happy little cry. "Oh, Mrs. Carew, I'm so glad you've come," she rejoiced. "This is—well, I don't know her name yet, but I know her, so it's all right. I met her in the Public Garden ever so long ago. And she's lonesome, and doesn't know anybody. And her father was a minister like mine, only he's alive. And she didn't have any Christmas tree, only blistered feet and chicken pie; and I want her to see mine, you know—the tree, I mean," plunged on Pollyanna, breathlessly. "I've asked her to come out tonight, or tomorrow night. And you'll let me have it all lighted up again, won't you?" "Well, really, Pollyanna," began Mrs. Carew, in cold disapproval. But the girl behind the counter interrupted with a voice quite as cold, and even more disapproving. "Don't worry, madam. I've no notion of goin'." "Oh, but please," begged Pollyanna. "You don't know how I want you, and—" "I notice the lady ain't doin' any askin'," interrupted the salesgirl, a little maliciously. Mrs. Carew flushed an angry red, and turned to go; but Pollyanna caught her arm and held it, talking meanwhile almost frenziedly to the girl behind the counter, who happened at the moment to be free from customers. "Oh, but she will, she will," Pollyanna was saying. "She wants you to come—I know she does. Why, you don't know how good she is, and how much money she gives to—to charitable 'sociations and everything." "Pollyanna!" remonstrated Mrs. Carew, sharply. Once more she would have gone, but this time she was held spellbound by the ringing scorn in the low, tense voice of the salesgirl: "Oh, yes, I know! There's lots of 'em that'll give to rescue work. There's always plenty of helpin' hands stretched out to them that has gone wrong. And that's all right. I ain't findin' no fault with that. Only sometimes I wonder there don't some of 'em think of helpin' the girls before they go wrong. Why don't they give good girls pretty homes with books and pictures and soft carpets and music, and somebody round 'em to care? Maybe then there wouldn't be so many— Good heavens, what am I sayin'?" she broke off, under her breath. Then, with the old weariness, she turned to a young woman who had stopped before her and picked up a blue bow. "That's fifty cents, madam," Mrs. Carew heard, as she hurried Pollyanna away.

10% More for Your Money

Quaker Oats is put up also in a 25-cent size, nearly three times as large as the 10-cent size. By saving in packing it offers you 10 per cent more for your money. See how long it lasts

Boys Who "Feel Their Oats"

The Vim That Lies in Quaker

Don't say, "My boy has energy enough." Working off an excess is the best thing a boy can do.

Vim insures fitness for study. It shows proper food, which means proper development. And the excess—exerted in work or play—helps build sturdy bodies.

The vim-food is Quaker Oats. You know that—everybody knows it. Nature has made of this grain an essence of vitality. The Quaker process has made it doubly delicious.

If you want boys or girls to "feel their oats," serve big dishes of Quaker Oats and never miss a day. Nobody gets too much.

Quaker Oats

Each Luscious Flake Gives Energy

Some Oats are starved in the growing. Some are plump and over-fed. We let horses get the small grains, and we pick for children just the big, plump, luscious oats. We get but ten pounds of Quaker Oats from a bushel.

One result is a wealth of vim-producing power. Another is a fascinating taste and aroma. Children love Quaker Oats and eat an abundance. And that's what every mother wants.

Quaker Cooker

We have made to our order—from pure Aluminum—a perfect Double Boiler. It is extra large and heavy. We supply it to users of Quaker Oats, for cooking these flakes in the ideal way. It insures the fullness of food value and flavor. See our offer in each package.

These rich oats have the flavor. By dry heat and steam heat we enhance it. Then we roll the grains into these large, luscious Quaker Oats.

You get this choice production when you ask for Quaker Oats, and it costs you no extra price. Its flavor has won millions. From all the world over mothers send here for these matchless flakes of oats.

RUTH CHOOSES THE TRUE GOD

RUTH 1

By Rev. F. B. Meyer, D.D.

"Thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God." Ruth 1: 16.

What a tribute to unconscious influence! Naomi was in the depths of despair. She said, "Call me Mara, for the Almighty hath dealt very bitterly with me. I went out full, and the Lord hath brought me home again empty." Empty! Nay, she was bringing her sheaves with her! Ruth was the product of her soul-travail. The young girl had watched her as she buried her husband and boys, and had been amazed at the noble bearing of the elder woman. Chemosh had never done the like for any of her people, and in her heart the Moabitess began to yearn after this God who could sustain and inspire a soul to suffer as Naomi did. When the choice had to be made, all those previous years of observation told heavily, and made her choose Jehovah. Thus a woman's character was being trained to become the ancestress of David, and the king-psalmist was the resultant of Naomi's agony. Let us suffer with unflinching faith and patience. We know not what young eyes are watching, what souls are being thrilled and inspired, what lives are going to shed a new fragrance through the years as the result of our travail of heart.

The Lesson Story

By Arthur H. Howland

A RESIDENT of Bethlehem, Elimelech by name, emigrated with his wife, Naomi, and their two sons to the land of Moab, east of the Dead Sea. The man's name indicates a pious ancestry—for it signifies "God is my King," or "My God is King." His sons' names would indicate that they had been sickly in infancy, for one was called "Mahlon" (sickly), and the other, "Chilion" (pining).

The reason for the move was a famine in the land of Judah. Elimelech hoped to find prosperity—or at least a livelihood—in Moab. The question has been asked, was it right for Elimelech to take his family into an idolatrous country? We cannot judge his case, but unless God's leadings are clearly to the contrary, unless one feels the ambition to build up a Christian home in a bad locality for the sake of exerting a purifying influence, a man should bring up his family in the best spiritual atmosphere he can find.

Whether Elimelech's choice was right or wrong, the family met grief. For the father and both sons died, not, however, till the sons had married each a Moabite girl. Bereft of husband and sons, Naomi's heart turns toward the land of Judah and the old home town of Bethlehem. Fearing that the sacrifice involved in leaving their friends was too great, she suggests that her daughters-in-law return to their former homes. They insist upon remaining with her, but she urges them to return, realizing that she has nothing to offer them in her own land, no hope of other sons to become husbands for them, nothing but affliction and privation and perhaps reproach because they were of an alien and ungodly race.

Orpah accepts the release offered and turns back. But Ruth, type of all warm, affectionate hearts, cannot leave this mother of her lover husband. Maclaren has thus characterized her answer: "Ruth's passionate burst of tenderness is immortal. It has put into fitting words for all generations the deepest thoughts of loving hearts, and comes to us, over all the centuries between, as warm and living as when it welled up from that pure, heroic soul. The two strongest emotions of our nature are blended in it, and each gives a portion of its fervor—love and religion."

The Two Choices

By Rev. Edwin Whittier Caswell

THE book of Ruth is like a beautiful engraving of peaceful, Hebrew, domestic and farming life, placed between the battle books of Judges and Samuel. It is an idyl of love, in contrast with the rise and fall of nations. It teaches that the humble, suffering, faithful poor will be exalted; that all races should be brothers, and that God's providence is over all his children.

Orpah went forward with Ruth with strong desire after the true God. She was fighting in her heart the battle all must fight, but sin and Satan won the victory. She looked away from Naomi and Israel to the old idol habits and ways she loved more than the true and good she had seen in Naomi's life. How tragic is the power of choice when the will leans towards evil! How many who desire to be saved from eternal loss choose the pathway that certainly leads to those realms! Orpah was never heard from after she returned to Moab.

Not so with Ruth. She had beheld in Naomi's transparent life the God who had comforted her in all her afflictions. When Ruth made her decision to cut loose from all her past and venture her future upon Naomi's God, she uttered words that have become immortal—"Thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God." Her simple eloquence must have been punctuated with tears of joy and sobs of delight, and no doubt sounded in the ears of the astonished mother-in-law as if spoken from heaven. Indeed, no angel could have uttered more thrilling sentiments of devotion. David, the grandest singer of the world, who has touched all the chords of melody in the harp of the soul, never excelled Ruth's poetic song gem of love. Perhaps he inherited his matchless talent from his Moabitish great-grandmother.

Ruth's courageous purpose and noble decision has been an example to all the ages. She chose for God; God chose for her a place in the sacred line of the Christ; honor and riches in this life and glory eternal in the hereafter. Has not Ruth, as she looked down from the upper galleries, gloried in her noble choice, especially as she viewed the achievements of her great-grandson and of David's greater Son, Jesus, the Saviour of the children of men?

Little she dreams, the wise and tender Ruth,
What dower is hers of an immortal youth;
That into every clime, in days afar,
Her life shall gleam like a pure Syrian star!

Boaz was the generous-hearted rich man of that day. His love for his laborers is seen in the kind words of greeting he gave them: "The Lord be with you." "The Lord bless thee." Then he said aside to them, "Let some handfuls fall for Ruth." Poor, weary, starving, wandering child in a strange land, how happy she was that day, when she gleaned a bushel of barley! There are benevolent wealthy people today, who leave a plenty in the fence corners of life for needy persons; may heaven's richest blessings rest upon them. As we glean for God let us not despise the little ones in the Sunday school, for they belong to Jesus in closer ties than kinship. Let us not forsake the deepest-dyed lost one in the slums of degradation.

Naomi means "God's pleasantness"; the real significance of her name was a long time coming to the front. At evening time it was light for her in the home of Boaz, and light forever afterwards among the heavenlies.

Search-no-farther Books

Your hunt for the right books to give or to own can end right here. These books will be permanently welcomed in any home. You will make no mistake in selecting one or more as gifts at any season or for your reading table.

FRIENDS O' MINE is a book you will like in spots, and like better in other spots, and best of all in certain spots. In other words the whole book will hold you no matter who you are, or how old or young. It is an unusual book of which this can be said, and Miss Margaret E. Sangster, Jr., is indeed an unusual writer. Just as did her famous grandmother before her, she is making a host of enthusiastic friends. The majority of the somewhat more than one hundred short stories, sketches and poems in Friends o' Mine have never before been published, and, of course, will not be excepting in this form. So you want this book. We want you to have it. We have published it because it is unusually worth while.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD RED LETTER BIBLE OR TESTAMENT

There is but one thing to say about these now famous Red Letter Bibles and Testaments: and that is a question: Do you possess one? If you answer "Yes," there remains this to ask: Have you a friend who does not possess one? If to either of these questions you answer "No," we have this to say:

We will send the MINION RED LETTER BIBLE postpaid with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one full year for $3.00. For a better binding add $1.00 to the above price. We will send the RED LETTER TESTAMENT postpaid with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one full year for $2.00. When ordering state whether you want Authorized or Revised Version.

In the Old Testament all references to Christ—the Messiah—are printed in red; in the New Testament all the words uttered by Christ are printed in red. The effect of this upon the reader is intensely inspiring, and, from a student viewpoint, peculiarly helpful.

Why was there a Moabitish link in the chain of Christ's ancestry? Perhaps because the Moabites descended from Lot, and Lot, the grandson of Abraham, Abraham's father, was the only one who followed Abraham to Canaan. A second reason is because the Gentile world, who were not of the Israel fold, were to be brought in, there would be one fold and one shepherd. God so loved the whole world of alien sinners that whosoever will may come unto him and be saved. Some of the most sinful were among the ancestors of Christ. Yet he himself could be sinless, and by his divine power lift uttermost sinners into the heights of sainthood.

Oh for such love for Christ as Ruth manifested in her choice! How can we go away from him? He has the words of eternal life; he dwells in the home of the infinite, preparing mansions for us. His love is our very breath; he is our way, truth and life. His name is a mighty power; his nature is love; his person is everlastingly changeable. His affection is sacrificial, unaffected by dark, cold nights of trial or by stony, steep hills of Calvary, or by wounds and sorrows. Who could knowingly reject the divine Son of God?

Life's still-recurring mystery of choice! He leads, and one rejects, the inward voice; dimly may mortal vision trace the end, how paths to glory or to blackness trend.

Echoes from the Holy Land

By Rev. Franklin E. Hoskins, D.D.
Member of Syria Mission

PALESTINE in the time of the Judges faced the desert and not the Mediterranean Sea. Unless we grasp this fact clearly we fail to catch the meaning of many of the events and the weird drift of certain periods of its history. It is peculiarly true concerning the Land of Moab. It lies east of the Jordan and the Dead Sea and south of the Jabbok to the brook Zered and contained about three thousand square miles. Mentioned in Genesis and the Song of Moses it was the scene of Numbers 21-36 and all the book of Deuteronomy. The Exodus ended in the Land of Moab; the wanderings ceased; the Joshua took command; there Moses died at the conquest of the Holy Land began.

The greatest charm of a journey in Moab is that so many of the ancient names remain unchanged to the present day. But the land in its present desolation, its insecurity, its lawlessness, its mournful ruins, is an open commentary, lighting up with electric flash the heavy pile of denunciations heaped by the prophets upon the lands of Moab and Edom.

Moab is mentioned one hundred and fifty-eight times in the Old Testament and the fate of the land and its people is the bitterest meted out to any of Israel's enemies.

The gleam of sunlight over her breezy plains is the idyllic story of Ruth the Moabitess, grandmother to King David and in the line of the generations of Jesus Christ, the Son of David, the Son of Abraham.

When traveling in the Land of Moab in 1902 and again in 1909, I was interested to note that only the merchants in the country of Moab came from Bethlehem, men with their families, who had just as naturally crossed the country before the Dead Sea as did Elimelech three thousand years before. An enterprising Turkish governor in Tafilah was actually planning for a carriage road from that point in Moab to Hron, from whence a carriage road already built leads to Ruth's village, Bethlehem.

Leadership Training Class

Conducted by Frank L. Brown, Joint General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

Superintendent Intermediate Department

THE Intermediate Department covers the years from 13 to 16. This age is the first of the periods of adolescence, and is called early adolescence, the years from 17 to 20 covering middle adolescence, and 21 to 24 later adolescence.

The Intermediate age covers years of great physical and mental change and growth, strong emotional life, spiritual crisis. They are years when the boy and girl is apt to break with the authority of the home and religion. The gang or club spirit is dominant. The emotions swing through people from one extreme to another. They do not understand themselves. Parents and friends do not understand them. Law is frequently defied. Love and sympathy only will win.

The special problems of these swift-moving years call for the special organization of an Intermediate Department, where the size of the school permits, with a superintendent or supervisor and as many helpers as the department may require. Where there are a sufficient number of young people they should be appointed on the Department Committees for special days, missions, temperance, social work, to give them training for future service. A special department secretary may be appointed for birthday remembrance of scholars and other records.

The intermediate age takes naturally to class organization, with the usual class officers, and committees on social and benevolent work. The certificate of organization should be obtained from the secretary of the State Sunday School Association and framed and hung upon the wall. Names and buttons for class organizations can be secured. In any event the International Association button for the Intermediate Department should be obtained and worn by the intermediates.

In The Sunday School and the Teens a list of organizations applicable to the intermediate can be found with names, objects, etc., such as Boy Scouts, Camp-Fire Girls, Knights of the Holy Grail, Miriam Circle, Knights of King Arthur, Dorcas and Queen Esther Circles. A home-made organization to fit local needs that shall include a few good features of the best organization, is often better than an effort to adopt the whole plan of a new organization.

If a department room is possible it should be decorated with a department intermediate pennant, a department motto, pictures, such as The Boy Christ in the Temple, by Hoffman; Washington in Prayer at Valley Forge, missionary heroes and subjects showing hospital and other service. Small class tables around which chairs can be grouped will be found of great service for teacher and scholars. A missionary library, as suggested in the missionary library list of the International Sunday School Association, will be invaluable during these years when, experience shows, missionary ideals and decisions are formed. Maps, charts, and material for good hard work should be furnished as well as the Underwood travel pictures illustrating the lessons. Where a separate room is unavailable, the Intermediate classes should be grouped together and as many as possible of these suggestions followed.

These years of early adolescence are the years when the great majority of decisions are made for Christ and for future Christian service. The goal of the department superintendent and teachers should therefore be to enlist every scholar definitely for Christ before they pass 16. The expression of this decision may not always take the form of testimony or prayer. It may find its choicest outlet in real service for others in hospital, nursery, orphanage, for shut-ins and in work for home and foreign missions. There is no limit to what young people in these years will do for those in need through work and personal sacrifice. "By serving, love will grow."

Care must be taken in mixing boys and girls in the social and recreational life of early adolescence. Separate organization of the boys' and girls' activities at this period is advisable. Department picnics, carefully supervised, have been successful, and especially class hikes to points of interest, giving opportunity for teacher and class to come together. From 16 to 18 the young people seek each other's society naturally, and at that time this association may be encouraged under proper conditions.

At 17 the graduating class or classes should, upon the fixed promotion Sunday or upon a week evening, be given the opportunity of a dignified graduation to the Senior Department.

Where the intermediate graded lessons are used the classes may be graded into groups of 13-, 14-, 15- and 16-year-old scholars. These lessons may be used as department lessons, all the scholars studying the same year until the course is completed, or the grade lesson for the grade year can be used, and the classes advanced from year to year until promotion.

The duty of the Sunday school to safeguard the moral welfare of the young people during early adolescence by sane plans for sex education is clear. The plans for carrying out such instruction involve delicate questions and require careful handling. Conferences with parents should certainly be invited by the superintendent of the Intermediate Department or school, and books suggested to parents for their use with their children. Where parents will not undertake this service to their own children the Sunday school teacher, after conference with parents and careful direction by pastor or superintendent, may provide their young people with some helpful book. Lists of such books can be obtained from the Purity Department of the Intermediate Sunday School Association. No false modesty should lead the teacher or parent to shirk this plain duty and privilege of guiding these boys and girls through the rocks and shoals of early adolescence.

The student in training for superintendency of the Intermediate Department should study one of the books suggested on Sunday school organization already mentioned for other officers in previous lectures; for specialization study, one of the following: The Intermediate Worker and His Work (Lewis); The Intermediate Department of the Church (Atheam); The Sunday School and the Teens (Alexander); The Teens and the Rural Sunday School (Alexander). Additional books suggested for information: The Girl in Her Teens (Slattery); The Boy and the Church (Foster); The Boy and the Sunday School (Alexander); The Big Boy (McKinney); The Church Work With Boys (Forbush); The Boy Problem (Forbush); Boy Training (Alexander); The Boy of the Street (Stelzle).

METHUSALEH lived nine hundred and sixty-nine years and wrote all his letters as his fathers did. Why shouldn't he? He had plenty of time. With him it wasn't a case of saving time but of killing time. But we don't live so long nowadays and most of us have gotten over the Methusaleh idea in the last thirty years. We have found that the time saved and the labor saved by the writing machine is worth saving by every one who has writing to do. Typewriting is two or three times faster than pen writing, it is easier and less fatiguing, it looks better and it is the up-to-date way to write. Reasons a plenty for buying a typewriter, don't you think? The typewriter for which YOU and most people have been waiting is the new

Remington JUNIOR Typewriter

Think of it! Here is a first-class typewriter, a genuine Remington, carrying the iron-clad Remington guarantee and embodying just the qualities you need.

The price of the Remington Junior is $50.00, cash with order. How does it differ from the standard hundred-dollar Remingtons? Only smaller, and lighter, and with fewer parts - just the machine you need for the simpler uses, such as manuscript and letter writing. For $55.00 we will sell you a Remington Junior on terms of $5.00 down and $5.00 a month.

What My Pupils Say:

"Every one notices the change in my complexion. It has lost that yellow color."

"Just think what you have done for me. Last year I weighed 216 lbs., this year 146, and have not gained an ounce back. I am not wrinkled either. I feel so young and strong, no rheumatism, or sluggish liver. I can breathe now, too. It is surprising how easily I did it. I feel 15 years younger."

"Just think! I have not had a pill or a cathartic since I began, and I need to take one every night."

"My weight has increased 30 lbs. I don't know what indigestion is any more, and my nerves are so rested! I sleep like a baby."

"Miss Cocroft, I have taken off my glasses and my catarrh is so much better. Isn't that good?"

"I feel as if I could look every man, woman and child in the face with the feeling that I am growing—spiritually, physically and mentally. Really I am a stronger, better woman. I don't know how to tell you or to thank you."

Reports like these come to me every day. Do you wonder I want to help every woman to vibrant health and happiness? Write me your name and address, and I will send you a copy of my book.

HEROES AND COWARDS

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

Sofa Philosophy. III

THE Girl stared off into a distance vaguely peopled with dream figures. Her eyes were sober and her mouth was drawn into a nearly straight line, while the hands lying idly in her lap were very quiet. Gold-colored shadows from the log fire fell across her hair, her little dark dress, her face. The room was still.

The Boy looked at her sharply from his end of the sofa, and an amused smile flickered over his face as he spoke:

"It's hard work, isn't it?" he questioned. The Girl came out of her reverie abruptly.

"What's hard work?" she asked him. "This heavy thinking," he answered. "I hate to see you go to so much trouble."

The Girl smiled and her eyes looked away from the dark end of the room. "You'll have to excuse me this once," she told him, "but do you know, I had forgotten that you were here. It's such a funny world, isn't it?"

The Boy did not look exactly pleased. He gazed gloomily into the fire with eyes that were just a little hurt. "Too bad that I'm so unimportant," he said stiffly.

The Girl reached over and laid a hand on his blue serge coat-sleeve. "I'm sorry," she told him, "but you don't mind, do you?"

The Boy grasped for the hand, and it was promptly withdrawn. "You know," he said, "that you can't make me really angry just because you're thinking. But you might let me know what it's all about."

The Girl brushed an imaginary speck of dust from the skirt of her dress. "I was thinking," she said softly, "that brave people are often cowards, and cowards often do the bravest things. This war has brought out a lot of that, I imagine. I wonder why it is?"

The Boy puckered his forehead in a large and formidable-looking frown. "It's one of the things that are hard to explain," he answered, "and I'm rather bad at trying to explain even the things that I understand. I only know that once I saw a man, who fainted at the sight of blood, run into a burning house to save a baby's life, after they told him that the roof would cave in any minute. He was a man that we called 'Scare-Cat' when we were children." He relapsed into thoughtful silence.

The Girl sighed as she gazed at the flickering firelight. "I was reading about a soldier the other day," she murmured, more to herself than to the Boy, "who dashed out under heavy fire and rescued his country's flag. It said in the paper that he was a peasant who everybody had thought was rather stupid and unpatriotic. He is going to be given a medal for bravery on the field of battle."

"Circumstances," said the Boy, "have a great deal to do with it, I think. If that man was asked what made him rescue the flag, he would probably look at you as if he didn't understand. It is all done more or less subconsciously. Given some love of country, a lot of firing, a few dying men and horses, a scream or two, and one of these stolid peasants might be expected to do anything."

"But"—the Girl was in an argumentative mood—"but that doesn't explain the man who dashed into the burning house."

"No, it doesn't," agreed the Boy. He relapsed into silence.

At the end of the room a clock ticked off the minutes, slowly, a bit somberly, perhaps. On the hearth the fire crackled and tiny sparks leaped spitefully out to the floor and died there. The Girl turned her head and looked at the face of the Boy.

"Who is thinking now?" she teased.

"Guilty," said the Boy. "But," he added, "I hadn't forgotten that you were here."

The Girl laughed. "It's useful," she said, "to kiss the blarney stone at least once a day. That's what you do, isn't it?"

The Boy moved down to the middle of the sofa. "Your disposition," he told her—and stopped abruptly. "But you know," he went on—"you did get me interested with your hero and coward talk."

"I'm glad," said the Girl, "that I was able to get you interested in something. And we'll leave my disposition out of this."

She moved to the farthest end of the sofa.

The Boy kicked his feet foolishly on the floor. "I wonder," he ventured at last, "what we'd do ourselves in an emergency. It's rather fun to guess. You're afraid of bugs and caterpillars and mice, and I've seen you cry, almost—when you were learning to skate and somebody left you alone on the ice. They say that you scream at the dentist's, and yet—perhaps you might really distinguish yourself in a boat wreck, or a flood."

The Girl looked resentfully into the fire. "Somebody," she grieved, "has been awfully mean. Who told you that I screamed at the dentist's, and that I cried when I was learning to skate? How did you know that I was scared when I saw bugs or caterpillars or mice?"

She shivered as she spoke.

The Boy laughed a self-satisfied, masculine laugh. "I was skating on the same pond when you learned," he told her. "And I've been with you a good many times when we have seen mice and caterpillars and other things, so I remember how you squealed. Besides, I know your dentist."

"So," the Girl lifted woe-begone eyes to his, "you think that I'm a coward? And yet over in Europe there are girls just as much afraid of those things as I am, bandaging terrible wounds, and cleaning horrible hospitals, and writing letters home for dying men. I might not be so bad if the test came."

The Boy was magnanimous. "I didn't mean to call you a coward," he told her contritely. "Though I've never been noticeably afraid of the things that bother you, I guess that there are plenty of trials and tasks and incidents that I'd rather not meet. If my real chance came I might cave in and be terribly ashamed of myself. Why," he said softly as he moved down along the sofa; "why, you've got me scared now. I haven't nerve enough—"

The clock struck many times and the Girl rose to her feet a bit hurriedly. "How the time does fly!" she said.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETINGS

NOTES ON THE CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR, EPWORTH LEAGUE AND BAPTIST YOUNG PEOPLE'S UNION TOPICS

The Promise of Forgiveness

Epworth League Topic for February 7. Isa. 55: 7; Acts 5: 31, 13: 38; Eph. 1: 7; Matt. 6: 14, 15; 1 John 1: 9

THE Christian Church says far too little about this great Christian doctrine of forgiveness. The great distinctive note of the Christian Gospel is not what God asks us to do for him, but what he invites us to let him do for us. God completely disarms the bad man by his wonderful offer of forgiveness. An evil-doer can stand up against condemnation, against punishment. But what can he say against forgiveness? How can he reject it? That is God's message to men: "I will abundantly pardon."

Yet, on the other hand, there is no doubt that some people abuse God's lovingkindness. They say: "If he will forgive so readily I will sin again and get forgiven."

Could anything be more base than that? If God's forgiveness does not make us hate sin; if it does not make us love him so warmly that we cannot endure the thought of grieving him again, then Christ's blood has thus far been shed for us in vain.

What Will Improve Our Prayer Meetings?

B. Y. P. U. Topic for February 7. 1 Cor. 14: 1-12, 26

IF EVERY question were as easy to answer as this, life would be a simple matter.

But although the answer is easy, its application involves some things that many of us will not like to do.

Nothing is so indicative of the change which has come over the Christian Church and the perils and weaknesses that confront us as the change in the spirit and method of the prayer meetings. In some churches it would be hard to recognize that the meeting which bears this name is in reality a prayer meeting.

So the answer is: make the prayer meeting what its name implies—that is, a service in which people meet together to pray.

This involves another thing, namely, that people know how to pray. We must get on familiar terms with God, we must know how to talk with him in our private thinking and living, so that when we meet with others who love him it will be an easy matter to talk with him there.

Next, the Christian prayer meeting includes testimony; that is, a statement of the things Christ has done for our soul. It follows as a matter of course that when people do not let Christ bless them they have nothing to say when testimony time comes in prayer meeting. Since they have nothing to say, they do not even go to the prayer meeting, and herein lies the secret of the prayer meeting's dwindling attendance. The remedy is to let Christ bless you. Then you will be so anxious to tell of it that you will go to the prayer meeting and, when the time comes, report the gladness you have found.

Lastly, the prayer meeting is a time for instruction in Bible truths. We must realize again that the pages of the Bible lead us to God himself. If the people find out that their pastor is giving them, week by week, soul-nourishing truths from God's Word, their spiritual hunger will drive them to the prayer meeting. You yourself can help by finding new treasures in the Book and telling the rest about them when you meet with them at the prayer service.

Christian Endeavor That Counts

Christian Endeavor Topic for February 7. 1 Cor. 15: 57, 58. (Christian Endeavor Day.)

THIS is the first day of "Christian Endeavor Week." The splendid results of the first observance of this week-long festival of Christian Endeavor activities last year should make each society determined to join in the celebration this year and make a still better record.

The main business of this first Sunday is to make it an "Ingathering Day," recruiting new members for the society. A "two-by-two" canvass of the Sunday school, church and community is to be made and every available young person asked to join. This canvass is also to be continued during the week, reports being made to the leader in charge.

Monday, the second day, is Entertainment Day. The canvass is to be continued and a social held in the evening to introduce the new members to the society.

Tuesday, the second day, is Local Union Day. The societies forming your local union are to get together if possible for some day-time functions, but without fail for an evening rally. There will be addresses on "How Christian Endeavor Can Help Secure a Saloonless Nation" and "War Against War."

Wednesday is Church Day, unless your church holds its mid-week service on some other day. If so, readjust the week's program to fit. The society is to attend the church prayer meeting in a body and help the service in every possible way. It is impossible to avoid the thought that this effort might well be made not once a year, but fifty-two times.

Thursday is Entertainment Day; Friday Extension Day, to be devoted to the formation of allied societies, such as Junior, Intermediate, Mothers', Senior, Prison, Floating, Office, College, Academy, Rural, etc. At present two-thirds of our societies have no Junior Society connected with them; and seven-eighths no Intermediate.

Saturday is Junior and Intermediate Day. This may include parades and mass meetings of the local Junior and Intermediate societies.

Sunday is Decision Day—on which decisions are urged for accepting Christ; for joining the Tenth Legion, pledging one-tenth of one's income to God's cause; for joining the Quiet Hour, pledging one's self to spend at least fifteen minutes a day in religious meditation, reading and prayer; for weekly attendance at prayer meeting; for uniting with the church; for devoting one's life to some form of special Christian service.

Fuller help for celebrating Christian Endeavor week may be secured from the United Society, Hancock and Mount Vernon Streets, Boston.

AMONG THE WORKERS

—A GREAT AWAKENING is reported from Fairport, N. Y., as a result of the four weeks' tabernacle campaign just closed by evangelists Burgess and Butts. The early extinction of the saloons of the town is predicted.

—EVANGELIST GEORGE E. BURGESS, assisted by Professor Benjamin F. Butts, musical director, and Mrs. Butts, who has charge of the personal work, is conducting a series of meetings at Medina, N. Y., to close February 7.

—EVANGELIST H. D. SHELDON and helpers recently conducted a most successful three weeks' campaign with the State Street Methodist Church of Ithaca, N. Y. Many professed conversion, and the attendance has taxed the capacity of the church, the largest in the city.

—UNION TABERNACLE MEETINGS at Bellaire, Ohio, conducted by Evangelists Hart and Magann, of Madison, Wis., are declared to have been greatly successful. Delegations of church members from Wheeling, Bridgeport, Martin's Ferry and many other nearby towns attended. These evangelists are now engaged in a union tabernacle campaign with the Protestant churches of East St. Louis, Ill. The tabernacle is located a mile from the central business district, yet 7,000 people attended the opening day.

—THE MARINERS' CHURCH of the New York Port Society is continuing its work of spiritual ministry and good fellowship for seamen during these months of unwonted hazard at sea. Beside the spiritual work of the mission and the practical help given the seamen, a series of monthly concerts is conducted under the direction of Mrs. Charles R. Scarborough, chairman of the Women's Auxiliary. The interest of many well-known artists has been secured, and the programs are greatly enjoyed by the men. The members of the crews of vessels in port often take part in these exercises and share the applause of their comrades. Rev. Samuel Boulton has been for many years the pastor of the mission.

"Promise me that you will try Sanatogen—"

AND at last he does promise. He tries Sanatogen, he takes it three times a day. Skeptical at first, his doubts soon vanish, for gradually but surely there is wrought a change which spells better health, a new happiness to himself and those dearest to him. The kindly, tonic effect of Sanatogen arouses the nervous system, not by falsely stimulating it, but by persistently feeding cell and tissue with its own concentrated pure nourishment.

Sanatogen

THE FOOD-TONIC

Now, also a relish for food returns, digestion is wonderfully improved—for remember, nerves and digestion depend on each other, and Sanatogen by aiding digestion and strengthening the nerve centres, restores harmony to both.

Such is the action of Sanatogen, well known to thousands and thousands of grateful people to whom Sanatogen has brought better health, stronger nerves, improved digestion, renewed efficiency of body and mind.

The world's most famous people know Sanatogen's effects from personal experience—the medical profession of five continents know them—and no less than 21,000 physicians have so testified in writing.

When will you know and feel the good Sanatogen is capable of doing?

THE BAUER CHEMICAL COMPANY
26-F Irving Place New York

From a Sermon Preached in the Big Tabernacle, Philadelphia, January 7, to 20,000 Auditors

Nearly one-half of the inmates of the reformatory, committed there for crimes, commit the crimes for which they are sent there while in a state of voluntary or involuntary vagrancy. One-tenth of them have lost their parents; one-half lost either father or mother, and 65 per cent. are from homes where the parents have been divorced. Broken homes and broken lives seem to go hand in hand, they are inseparably connected. Many times sons and daughters are brought up in idleness; unrestrained in the expenditure of their money, rapidly acquiring extravagant habits, they figure in escapades that scandalize society, indulge in fast horses, gambling, men

If a boy will not obey his father and mother, he will not obey the social and moral law. If he won't obey you in your home, it is out of such that anarchists, nihilists, bomb-throwers and cutthroats are had. One of the danger signs of our times is the curse of the idle mother. Many a woman never darns a stocking, never a piece of hem-stitching on a handkerchief, never put any lace or insertion on a thing; they manage to drag their old carcasses around, and if they ever go out, it is to some entertainment, some bridge whist

You can clothe your children in silks and satins, bedeck them with French ribbons until they outrival a French millinery store, and yet they are orphans, though you still live. Show me your children, show me the company you keep, show me the nature of the books you read, and though I have never been in your home, I will write you a perfect history of it, and it will tell you how it came out. And I believe the ideal mother is the product of a civilization that rose from the manger of Bethlehem.

THE PRAYER LEAGUE

An urgent appeal comes from M. S. C. for prayers for a friend who has eluded two operations for cancer of the tongue and throat. The disease is reappearing and is now beyond the reach of surgical skill. She adds: "If there is any one anywhere possessed with a large faith will he or she write to me in behalf of my friend in care of the Christian Herald."

Prayers are requested for revivals at Oyster Bay, L. I.; Norwich, Conn.; Arkesaw, Wis.; Limona, Fla. Prayers are asked for blessing upon special meetings to be held at Rutland, B. C.; Venus, Pa.; for revival in a church at North River Mills, W. Va.; for the blessing of God's Spirit upon a series of meetings in the Baptist church at Inkerton, Iowa; for revival in a church at Hutsonville, Ill. Rev. C. E. Asks prayer for God's blessing upon his work in a new field of labor; a reader, that members of her Sunday school class may be converted. A. M. and Mrs. B. B. suggest prayer for a world-wide revival.

E. M. D. asks prayer that his wife's mind may be restored; Mrs. C. C. W., her husband's; Miss A. C. H., her mother's; L. J., her nephew's; A. Rider, a friend's; A. L. A., that his wife's mind may be strengthened; Miss L. A. McC. and P. A. L., for mental strengthening.

J. N. N. asks prayer that sister's sight may be restored; F. J., Mrs. W. C. B. F., Miss L. A. McC., Mrs. M. E. R. and J. M. C., ask prayer for strengthening of sight or relief from other eye troubles for themselves or friends.

Twenty-four friends ask prayer for a deeper work of grace, assurance of sin forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing.

Fourteen friends ask prayer that relatives or friends may be cured of the appetite for strong drink, including one that four sons may be delivered from this appetite, and another that father and three sons, a mother and wife may be delivered. One friend to be cured of the morphine habit.

Twenty-one parents ask prayer for the conversion of sons, including one that seven sons may be saved, another that three sons may be saved, and another that three sons and their wives may be saved.

Five wives ask prayer for the conversion of their husbands.

Thirty-six friends ask prayer for the conversion of other relatives and friends, including one woman that five children may be saved.

Seven friends ask prayer for special spiritual blessing for relatives or friends.

Three sons and daughters ask prayer for the healing of mothers; one daughter for the healing of father; nine mothers and fathers for healing of sons; nine for healing of daughters, including one mother that daughter may have the power of speech and use of limbs; four wives for the healing of husbands; five friends ask prayer for the healing of sisters; four for the healing of brothers; forty-five for healing for themselves, including one that health may be restored and use of hands and feet regained, and another for relief from spinal weakness; nineteen for the healing of other relatives and friends.

Eight friends ask prayer for healing of hearing for themselves or other friends.

Fifteen friends ask prayer for help or guidance in financial affairs.

Thirty-three friends ask prayer for the granting of varied desires and needs, including one that son may receive pardon and release from prison.

tically, but involving considerable loss of life.

At the end of the week severe fighting took place in and to the north of the Somme, which resulted in the Germans winning considerable ground and the French being forced to abandon their position on the northern bank of the Aisne and retreat to the southern, with very heavy losses, between five and six thousand prisoners falling into German hands. This is the most important advance on this line which has been made in the last three months, and if held by the Germans will be a serious loss for the Allies. The Allies hold the advance mentioned last week on the extreme west of the line near Nieuport, but have lost some ground on the extreme east in Alsace.

Great Britain has commenced to move forward a portion of the so-called Kitchener's new army, and expects to put a half million fresh troops on the firing line during the next three weeks, it is stated.

As an illustration of the fierceness of the struggle on the western battle line, though this struggle has not of late been marked by any dramatic or sensational episodes, this fact, set forth in the latest English papers, is worthy of notice:

About the tenth of last October the first battalion of the Royal Welsh Fusiliers left England with a full complement of officers and, as to rank and file, 1,100 strong. On December 31 the battalion returned, eighty-seven strong, and led by a quartermaster, no officer being left.

This is not an isolated case, either. The Scots Guards, the Grenadier Guards (two battalions) and many other regiments have suffered equally severe losses, and in a dozen instances, it is said, there are not men enough left to make a full company and not enough officers to command that company.

The London Scottish First Battalion is, it is said, today pretty well wiped out. This was the first of the volunteer troops to go to the front.

Figures like these bring home more strongly than any words of description could do the intensity of the struggle.

These figures are, without the slightest doubt, duplicated among the French regiments, as well as among the Germans.

The Russo-Turkish campaign has given rise to such a mess of contradictory cables that it is extremely difficult to form any clear idea of what is really happening.

The Russian bulletins in the latter part of last week announced a crushing defeat of the Turks near Ardahan in the Transcaucasus, claiming to have captured one entire Turkish army corps, and to have another surrounded in such a position that surrender was inevitable. The Turks denied these facts absolutely and the Turkish forces in this vicinity were, by Russian statements, acting on the offensive.

The Turks are rapidly advancing in northwestern Persia, where the Russians placed garrisons some years ago, and are driving the Russians before them. The bombardment of the Dardanelles still remains apparently without definite results.

There have been many rumors during the week of the impending entrance into the war of Rumania, Bulgaria, Greece and Italy, but up to the present writing there has been no definite action taken by either one of these powers. The terrible earthquake in Italy will, no doubt, have considerable influence on her immediate future course.

It is conservatively estimated that 95 per cent. of the railways, 80 per cent. of the manufacturers, 85 per cent. of the trades and 75 per cent. of the agriculturalists discriminate against workmen who drink. Shades of "Personal Liberty!"

Start Farming In Your Back Yard

And Make It Pay While You Are Getting Ready to Move Into the Country

There are contentment, happiness and profit in learning to farm, if you begin in a small way on a small plot of land.

The hotbed will supply your table with fresh vegetables and lead you into truck gardening.

The window box will beautify your home and show you how to grow flowers for market.

A dozen hens will supply you with fresh eggs and train you to start a commercial egg farm.

A single hive of bees will give you honey for all the year and teach you how to make a living from an apiary.

A few trees will fill your cans with fruit and lead you into the fascinating field of orcharding.

Learn the fundamentals on a small scale and you can easily adapt them to the big farm.

Women Manage Farms

The farm housewife usually does the reading, thinking and a lot of the planning, while the man does the heavy field work. But she needs an adviser to tell her what to do step by step each week. Our personal service is as valuable to the women as to the men—in fact, of the thousands of letters received by us each month fully 25 per cent are written by women. More than one hundred experts in every line of farm endeavor—indoors and out—are at our call, and your question will be answered personally and promptly by mail, without charge to you.

The COUNTRY GENTLEMAN

To put it at once into half a million homes, thirteen issues of the big $1.50 national farm weekly will be mailed to your address for 25 cts.

The Test of Time

27 Years' Record
Behind A-R-E 6's

THE 6% Bonds, based on the ownership of selected New York real estate, offered by the American Real Estate Company are "seasoned." Time and experience have proven their worth. Through panic and prosperity they have paid interest and matured principal on due dates. They have withstood every test, and offer their purchasers today, as in the past, a just return, ample security and ready convertibility.

During these years more than 40,000 investors have been served and more than $12,000,000 returned in principal and interest. More than one-third of the Company's outstanding bonds today represent re-investment by satisfied investors.

The American Real Estate Company is the oldest and one of the largest real estate operating corporations in New York. In the continued development of its business along the sound lines of the past, the Company offers to its investors its direct contract obligations, issued in convenient forms for large or small investors by either full or installment payment, as follows:

6% Coupon Bonds

In denominations of $100, $500, $1,000 and upward, paying interest semi-annually by coupons attached. Principal payable in 10 years.

6% Accumulative Bonds

For those who wish to invest $25 or more a year, and accumulate $1,000 and upward in 10, 15 or 20 years. Purchasable by annual, semi-annual, or quarterly installments.

Printed matter and map of New York City, fully describing these Bonds and the business on which they are based, will be sent on request.

INVESTMENT AND INSURANCE COUNSEL

This department is maintained for the benefit of our regular readers; the service is offered entirely free of cost to them, and all correspondence is strictly personal and confidential, in so far as the identity of the inquirer is concerned. Always enclose letter postage and write name and address plainly, addressing your inquiry to Financial Editor, CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York City.

Neither THE CHRISTIAN HERALD nor any other publication can guarantee the value of investment securities. We do all we can, however, to make sure of the integrity of our advertisers before admitting them to our columns. Any advice given is an expression of our conclusions, based upon information we believe to be reliable; but we must not be held responsible, should any loss arise from its acceptance.

ANSWERS TO FINANCIAL QUERIES

L. S. N., NEW YORK. The fiscal agency in New York City for the State of Oklahoma is the Chatham & Phenix National Bank, 192 Broadway, New York City.

M. E., NEW YORK. United Profit Sharing stock, having risen in price about 1600 per cent. since first offered to shareholders of United Cigar Stores of America, seems to offer no more than a very uncertain speculation. Should you buy at present price you would pay sixteen times the par value.

REV. A. W. L. The question is, will the insurance company accept you as a good medical risk or find your health impaired, and be willing only to issue what is called an "under-average risk"? So we advise you to ask the company to direct you to the authorized physical examiner in your city. The company bears the expense of the examination.

DR. D. O. M. If you prefer railroad bonds for your investment of approximately $6,000, we would suggest the following:

Atch. Top. & S. Fe. gen. 4s at..... 90½
Chic. Bur. & Quincy Joint 4s at..... 96
Northern Pacific 4s at..... 90
Southern Pacific conv. 5s..... 96½
Southern Railway 1st 5s at..... 98½
U. S. Steel Corp. s. f. 5s..... 101½

F. A. M., GEORGIA. (1) Keep out of court, if possible. Lawsuits are expensive and unsatisfactory. (2) Buy six $100 bonds of public utility companies, all different. (3) The "savings club" plan is excellent. If you will send us the names and addresses of your out-of-town friends, lists of all the prominent issues of public utility bonds which may be obtained in $100 pieces will be sent.

MRS. A. R. W., CONNECTICUT. The soundest issue in your list is Chicago and Northwestern 1s, 1987, at 90. The next best, in our opinion, is Third Avenue refunding 4s, 1960, at 80½. Our third selection would be Southern Railway general 4s, 1956, at 64. The other issues are considerably more speculative, all of them to some degree attractive for a business man's investment, but hardly appropriate for a woman's.

REV. C. E. D., VERMONT. Don't send any money to H. L. Barber & Co., Chicago. It would be returned—not by Barber, but by the government. Barber's offices were raided recently by postal inspectors, and Barber was locked up charged with fraud in connection with the sale of Consolidated Midway Chief Oil stock. Many of our readers can thank us for the warnings we gave about this fellow and his magazine, Investing for Profit.

W. J. W., DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA. The Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York and the Northwestern Mutual Life Insurance Company of Wisconsin are among the largest in the country. You need have no fear regarding the safety of your policies. The aggregate of the risks assumed in Europe by the big American life insurance companies, we are told, is less than 4 per cent. in the average of their total business, and losses are more than offset by an extra ten per cent. war premium charged on all policies issued to men in Europe who engage in military occupation.

S. H. J., NEW YORK. (1) While Westinghouse Air Brake pays four per cent. quarterly the yield from the investment at present price of the stock is only 6.60 per cent. The par value of this stock is only $50. (2) A five per cent. stock dividend was paid April 15, 1913.

MRS. S. C., ONTARIO. You made a most unfortunate investment when you bought 100 shares of Missouri Pacific last March. The stock has dropped to a new low record of 6½. The great decline in the stock may be attributable to the natural forces of gravity at work, and the situation presented for the stockholders certainly is dubious. You will lose if you sell; you will lose if you don't. Frankly, we don't know how to advise. Ever since this department was inaugurated we have advised our readers to keep out of Missouri Pacific.

MRS. H. C., NEW YORK. We can find no value to your King Gold Mining Development stock and have returned certificate.

MRS. A. P., PENNSYLVANIA. (1) We should advise you to sell your bonds immediately, provided it can be done. (2) Write to Brooks & Company, members of the New York Stock Exchange, Scranton, Pa., a firm usually able to obtain a market for these issues.

A. F. L., NEW JERSEY. We regard Interborough Rapid Transit Company First and Refunding Gold 5s a sounder investment—more attractive in every way to an Eastern investor than the Western traction issue you ask about. At current price these bonds will yield about 5.15 per cent. An assured marketability is one of the attractive features of Interborough 5s.

H. S., OHIO. The Postal Life Insurance Company has been doing business under New York charter for nearly ten years. The company is one of the old-line legal-reserve life insurance institutions, that is, it maintains a full legal reserve with the New York Insurance Department for the protection of its policyholders everywhere. The company, employing no solicitors and doing business wholly by advertising and correspondence, claims to effect a decisive saving by this means, and it writes life insurance at a lower rate than the other companies which secure their business through agents. From the fact that the company maintains the legal reserve required by law and is chartered and permitted to do business in the state of New York, we have every reason to believe that its policies are safe and enduring.

W. S., NEW YORK. Omaha City 4½s are highly regarded as a conservative investment issue. We think, however, living as you do in the state of New York, you would find the municipals of this state preferable, they being tax-exempt and yielding quite as much as the western municipals. Our preference would be for city of Buffalo 4½s (1934) and city of Utica 4½s (1921-1934). You may obtain prices on these issues from any New York banking firm.

T. L. N., NEW YORK. (1) City of Alberta, Dominion of Canada, 5 per cent. debentures are well regarded. (2) Also Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway preferred stock. (3) Although possessing a somewhat speculative cast, Atchison common is regarded as an exceptionally attractive investment for income. (4) The preferred stock will yield 5 per cent. and the common stock 6.50 per cent. You will not regret the purchase of any of the three above issues.

P. D. D., CALIFORNIA. (1) Short-term commercial notes paying 6 per cent. are undoubtedly attractive for a part of your investment. (2) We should accept the Montana firm's offer of the $2,500 farm mortgage for the balance of your $5,000. (3) We know nothing about the mortgagee. Really this is quite unnecessary, for the bankers stand very high and would be most unlikely to offer a mortgage which is not absolutely secure.

H. H., PENNSYLVANIA. We do not regard the 8 per cent. debentures you speak of as a desirable investment. Indeed we caution you to keep out of all 8 per cent. investments. A man looking for 8 per cent. is usually unconsciously looking for trouble. When investments promise to pay more than 6 per cent. look into them very carefully and into the reputation of the firm offering them.

O. C. R., FLORIDA. The American Smelting & Refining stock would hardly be called an investment of conservative nature. Christian Herald readers had better avoid such issues unless they are desirous of engaging in positive speculation and can well afford to encounter loss if they have to.

MRS. A. P. M., TEXAS. $18,000 is a good deal of money for a woman to invest, and the greatest care should be exercised in proper selection of securities and in correct diversification. You state that you do not anticipate the need of sudden conversion of your investments into cash. This simplifies matters somewhat. We suggest that you apportion the entire amount approximately as follows: $5,000 in farm mortgages at 6 per cent.; $5,000 in utility bonds—underlying issues, averaging 5½ per cent.; $5,000 in first mortgage railroad bonds of the first class, averaging 4½ per cent.; $2,000 in short term notes at 6 per cent.; $2,000 in real estate bonds averaging 5½ per cent.; $2,000 in railroad stock, like Atchison, at 6 per cent. By such a diversification your annual income from the investment of $18,000 will amount to $1,057, or about 5½ per cent. It will be a good plan to communicate with a number of banking firms, asking them to submit current offerings to you for your consideration. We shall be glad to advise definitely respecting the various suggestions they make to you.

CHAPTER XIII

A WAITING AND A WINNING

I WAS a delightful plan. Pollyanna had it entirely formulated in about five minutes; then she told Mrs. Carew. Mrs. Carew did not think it was a delightful plan, and she said so very distinctly.

"Oh, but I'm sure they'll think it is," cried Pollyanna, in reply to Mrs. Carew's objections. "And just think how easy we can do it! The tree is just as was—except for the presents, and we can get more of those. It won't be so very long till just New Year's Eve; and only think how glad she'll be to see! Wouldn't you be, if you hadn't had anything for Christmas only blisted feet and chicken pie?"

"Dear, dear, what an impossible child you are!" frowned Mrs. Carew. "But yet it doesn't seem to occur to you that we don't know this young woman's name."

"So we don't! And isn't it funny, when I feel I know her so well?" smiled Pollyanna. "You see, we had such a good talk in the Garden that day, and she told me all about how lonesome she was, and that she thought the loneliest place in the world was in a crowd in a big city, because folks didn't think or notice. Oh, there was one thing noticed; but he noticed too much, she said, and he hadn't ought to notice her any—which is kind of funny, isn't it, when you come to think of it. But anyhow, he came for her there in the Garden to go somewhere with him, and she wouldn't go, and he was a real handsome gentleman, too—until he began to look so cross, just at the last. Folks aren't so pretty when they're cross, are they? Now there was a lady today looking at bows, and she said—well, lots of things that weren't nice, you know. And she didn't look pretty, either, after—after she began to talk. But you will let me have the tree New Year's Eve, won't you, Mrs. Carew?—and invite this girl who sells bows, and Jake? He's better, you know, now, and he could come. Of course Jerry would have to wheel him—but then we want Jerry, anyway."

"Oh, of course, Jerry!" exclaimed Mrs. Carew in ironic scorn. "But why stand with Jerry? I'm sure Jerry has hosts of friends who would love to come. And—"

"Oh, Mrs. Carew, may I?" broke in Pollyanna, in uncontrollable delight. "Oh, how good, good, GOOD you are! I've so wanted—"

"No, no, Pollyanna, I—" she began, protestingly. But Pollyanna, entirely mistaking the meaning of her interruption, plunged in again in stout championship.

"Indeed you are good—just the bestest ever; and I shan't let you say you aren't. Now I reckon I'll have a party all right! There's Tommy Dolan and his sister Jennie, and the two MacDonald children, and three girls whose names I don't know that live under the Murphys, and a whole lot more, if we have room for 'em. And only think how glad they'll be when I tell 'em! Why, Mrs. Carew, seems to me as if I never knew anything so perfectly lovely in all my life—and it's all your doings! Now mayn't I begin right away to invite 'em—so they'll know what's coming to 'em?"

And Mrs. Carew, who would not have believed such a thing possible, heard herself murmuring a faint "yes," which she knew bound her to the giving of a Christmas-tree party on New Year's Eve to a dozen children from Murphy's Alley and a young woman whose name she did not know.

Perhaps in Mrs. Carew's memory was still lingering a young woman's "Sometimes I wonder there don't some of 'em think of helpin' the girls before they go wrong." Perhaps in her ears was still ringing Pollyanna's story of that same young woman who had found a crowd in a big city the loneliest place in the world, yet who had refused to go with the handsome young man that had "noticed too much." Perhaps in Mrs. Carew's heart was the undefined hope that somewhere in it all lay the peace she had so longed for. Perhaps it was a little of all three, combined with utter helplessness in the face of Pollyanna's amazing twisting of her irritated sarcasm into the wide-sweeping hospitality of a willing hostess. Whatever it was, the thing was done; and at once Mrs. Carew found herself caught into a veritable whirl of plans and plottings, the center of which was Pollyanna and the party.

important towns, and Sodowski, who explored the Mississippi from its source to its mouth, were Poles. Four millions of people in whose veins runs the blood of Sobieski and Kosciuszko and Paulski and Sodowski live in Russia today, and for the most part they are upright, industrious citizens. Perhaps the Poles themselves are in some degree responsible for the low estate of their country. It must be admitted that they often quarreled among themselves, that they did not always support their best leaders, and that when they had secured a large measure of home rule under Alexander of Russia, their rebellion led the Czar to take away their liberties, and finally to incorporate their ancient kingdom into Imperial Russia.

Nevertheless, they always have been and are a high-spirited, liberty-loving, brave people, manifesting many of the traits of the Slavic character. They are a people of artistic temperament, as their great painters, musicians, novelists and poets testify. To prove this, I need only mention the names of Chopin and Mickiewicz and Sienkiewicz and Sienkiewicz—the last the most popular historical novelist of the present day, whose "Quo Vadis" is thousands of American homes.

In late years Russian Poland has become comparatively prosperous from a material standpoint, for it has been a great manufacturing plant for one of the Russian empire. Cotton and woolen goods, boots and shoes, harnesses, machinery, paper and sundries of all kinds have been exported in ever-increasing volumes to all parts of eastern Europe and even to far-off Siberia.

Lodz was the great national workshop. Alas, what is it today? When I saw it, its streets swarmed with the sons of toil, and its houses were the homes of a half-million of industrious and comparatively contented people, who, nevertheless, had not lost their love for Poland or their desire for liberty.

Warsaw, some sixty miles from Lodz, is the political, literary and social capital of Russian Poland; a great, beautiful, enterprising city, which honors its poets and artists and musicians more than its men of wealth and station. There are few more interesting cities in all Europe than Warsaw. Its situation, on the Vistula, is commanding, its history is romantic, its very streets are alive with thrilling memories of the past, while the beautiful and stately buildings and churches and homes tell of prosperity and refinement.

What will be the condition of Warsaw when my readers, a few days or weeks hence, scan these words, I cannot predict, and what will be its fate in future days no one is wise enough to tell. At least let us sympathize with and pray for this devoted people, and give as we are prosperous to relieve their dire distress.

OUR admiration of wedding gifts is often tempered by a realization of the care they will require. But if the bride has been "brought up" on Ivory Soap, the responsibility will not weigh so heavily upon her as we imagine.

To Clean Cut Glass

Use a wooden tub or a padded dish pan. Put one piece at a time in lukewarm Ivory Soap suds and let it remain a few minutes. Then go over it with a medium stiff nail brush. Rinse twice in water of the same temperature as the Ivory Soap suds. Add a little bluing to the second rinse water; this gives brilliancy. Dry with a soft flannel or a piece of cheesecloth which has been washed. Polish with soft tissue paper.

To Polish Silver

Put half of a small cake of Ivory Soap, shaved fine, and a quarter-pound of whiting into one quart of water. Boil until dissolved. Use this paste as whiting is used, then polish with a fine cheesecloth or chamois. The Ivory Soap modifies the harshness and grittiness of the whiting without impairing its polishing value.

If she is an Ivory Soap girl, she will know that Ivory Soap is good not merely for washing the hands, the face and the dishes, but for keeping almost every beautiful thing in a home at its best.

The people who use Ivory Soap soon learn that its purity, mildness and quality give it a very wide scope. They depend upon it for keeping things like new which, in other homes, soon lose their charm.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

A WEEKLY ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER FOR THE HOME

ITALY'S WOE

THE full horror of the earthquake disaster that fell upon Italy in the early morning of January 13 is not yet known. Estimates of the dead increase daily, amounting at present to around thirty-five thousand, and the numbers of injured are added to as fast as relief parties reach the widely scattered towns that were overthrown. The property damage has been roughly estimated as from fifty million to a hundred million dollars. Entire towns have been annihilated. Survivors for the most part are either homeless, or too fearful of recurrent shock to enter their dwellings. Italy is confronted by a gigantic task of relief, and the tension upon the kingdom has been increased by additional earthquakes, which have been felt in different sections.

The Department of the Abruzzi, where the greatest shock of the earthquake was felt, is a mountainous district to the east of Rome, and has an average altitude of between four and five thousand feet. In these higher altitudes the climate is severe. The occupations of the people have hitherto been chiefly to do with forestry and agriculture, wines and cereals being produced in the lower fertile valleys, and asphalt in some other parts.

The day had scarcely begun for the Italian people when this catastrophe came upon them. Most families were still in their homes. Schools, hospitals and other institutions were no more than awakes. The great question of whether their land was to be plunged into war had not been begun again to fill the hours with inquiry and debate. Italy was still at peace.

Some years back, scientists began to seek a way to determine in advance when and where nature would break out into some deadly cataclysm. It was believed that enough had been learned about earthquakes, volcanic eruptions and tidal waves to enable men to wrest this important secret from the earth and sea and sky. By computation and observation and records of delicate instruments, men would foretell earthquakes as they foretell storms. But again all the science of learned men has been unavailing. Without warning, without even a foreboding in some supersensitive soul, the earth beneath the feet of Italy moved in a mighty and indescribable convulsion and the peninsula rocked and quaked.

And instantly what scientists could not foretell, they now had taken place. Delicate seismographs in observatories of Europe and America gave out the startling news of another disastrous earthquake somewhere. The instruments at Rome recorded a mighty tremor for thirty seconds, beginning at 7.55 in the morning of January 13. At Georgetown University, Washington, the vibrations were noted on the seismograph at about 2.23 of that morning, and the evening papers of that day gave the first news of the calamity—dearly more than an intimation that death and destruction had been caused in Italy by the shock.

THE ruin in Italy was instantaneous. Before the frightful, sickening movement of the solid earth was understood, the houses of the people were falling about their heads. Only the incomparable swiftness of a mother's intuition was swift enough to snatch the baby from the cot ere the opening floor and wall dropped the tiny bed to destruction. But alas, no movement was then swift enough to save the mother and babe! Terror and consternation at threaten with destruction any who sought in frantic haste to dig within the mass of fallen floors and roofs for friends. White, sulphurous vapor, it is said, issued from crevices of the earth about this doomed town.

The commune of which Sora was the center contained some seventeen thousand inhabitants, and it is feared that only a few hundred escaped with their lives. Villages that stood on precipitous mountainsides simply disappeared. And as rescue parties penetrated farther and farther within the scene of devastation, they came upon successive heaps of ruins of what were happy little hamlets, but now are scenes of unutterable desolation.

The area in which this earthquake wrought destruction extended a distance of about three hundred miles lengthwise of the peninsula, and its full width across. In a general way, Naples and Ferrara marked the southern and northern extremities of this area. Those who have reported their experience amidst the ruins claim that the devastation is greater in kind than that which was witnessed at Messina in 1908, when volcanic eruption, earthquake and tidal wave overthrew that populous city and all the region about, bringing death to perhaps four or five times the numbers who are believed to have perished in the Abruzzi earthquake.

The political departments or provinces of Latium, Campania and Abruzzi are included in the area of the general upheaval. The weather was severe and accompanied in some sections by violent storms. Temperatures fell very low. These conditions and general disorganization of telegraphic and telephonic, and for a day or so of railway, communications greatly delayed the receipt of news from the outlying districts. Railway stations and railway bridges were wrecked. Roads were impeded. Masses of rock and soil were dislodged from the mountain sides and added their destruction to the damage already wrought. At one point a landslide a mile long and nearly two hundred yards wide is said to have left a gigantic hole that promptly became a lake. In Switzerland avalanches were started by the vibrations.

Without waiting for full reports, the government instituted relief work on a large scale. King Victor Emmanuel took active charge for a time and, accompanied by the Duke and Duchess of Aosta and others, made a tour of the stricken region in automobiles. Detachments of the military were set at work throughout the district, and it is said that these soldiers literally starved themselves in order to feed those who were found dazed and injured and homeless in the different towns.

A considerable number of soldiers who were stationed at different points in the earthquake zone were killed in their barracks at the time of the disaster.

The urgent work of rescue was also aided by the survivors of the different towns, who, as soon as they realized what had occurred, in most cases set frantically to work digging in the ruins to reach imprisoned friends whose cries directed their efforts.

One of the most terrible things about this horror was this cry for help from amidst the wreckage. These heart-rending cries continued almost for days, but in steadily diminishing volume as one by one the helpless victims succumbed. Many instances are reported of survivors recognizing the voices of their loved ones whom they were unable to reach. In numberless cases a living hand or a foot could be touched, but hours of work would prove unavailing in lifting away the masses of stone and debris. This phase of the tragedy has been spoken of as a great and terrible wail rising over the whole region, a wail of agony and despair which those who heard will never forget.

Among the instances of seemingly miraculous escapes from destruction is mentioned that of a couple who were left crouching in the doorway on the second floor when the walls of their house collapsed. So great was the wreckage about them that they could not be reached, even with ladders, and finally jumped from their dangerous refuge and were picked up badly injured. Another is that of a mother and her little baby, born within the wreckage that imprisoned her, both rescued alive. Instances of personal heroism are constantly coming to light; but so swift and mighty was the overthrow that scant chance was given any who escaped to save others. A handful of people who escaped death in many of the towns, realizing how hopeless any effort on their part to help those who were entombed would be, erected signmarks to indicate where their own homes had been before fleeing for safety and for help.

Copyright, Underwood & Underwood

A CORNER OF THE DESTROYED TOWN OF SORA

The complete cessation of the routine of life and the interruption of travel produced a dire shortage in all the supplies and famine quickly threatened all that side of Italy. Offers of outside aid rushed from many points, including an early message from our ambassador at Rome, Thomas Nelson Page. President Wilson also cabled his sympathy. The Italian Government expressed appreciation of America's readiness to be of service, but took the position that official aid would not be necessary and only such gifts as might come from private sources would be acceptable. Because of this, the Christian Herald and others in this country refrained from engaging in relief work.

It is evident that the Italian Government are doing all that is in their power to meet the needs of the situation. Railway transportation has been put on a normal basis again and, according to Ambassador Page, relief organizations which soldiers have a large place, is efficient. By January 20 as many as a thousand injured persons had been sent to Rome, where schools and barracks have been turned into temporary hospitals. Business life is resumed in the earthquake zone, though the people, as a whole, are still under the paralysis of fear and grief.

The cause of the disturbance is a matter of scientific speculation. One theory is that the displacement of rock sub-strata and the subsequent settling of the crust of the earth may have been caused by filtration of heavy rains, converted into steam, which had found space for itself; or by vibrations of the earth set up by the concussion of the great guns in the lery duels, as another suggests. No unusual activity has been noticed on the part of Mount Vesuvius, though it is stated that several craters of extinct volcanoes seemed to show signs of renewed life.

It will still be many days, if not weeks, before the exact extent of casualties will be known. The mourns anew a sudden destruction of thousands of her people, and is bearing this new burden of suffering with noble patience. Many of her finest churches and historic buildings, especially in Rome, have sustained damages, in some cases irreparable. The history of great calamities a new and particularly terrible chapter has been written.

THE WAR IN EUROPE *

BY ANTHONY ARNOUX

European journalist of many years' standing; military critic staff writer of the Paris Daily Mail and Le Temps; contributor to L'Indépendance Belge

FOR the first time probably in military history armies in the field are now provided with complete laundry facilities. The laundry machinery is transported on automobiles arranged for that purpose, and embraces a complete washing, drying and ironing plant. Large boilers, also mounted on automobiles, furnish the hot water, the power being supplied by the engines of the automobiles on which the laundry is mounted. The whole plant can be working in a very few minutes after its arrival at a particular place. One of these laundries now at Kutno, Russian Poland, is said to have a capacity of several thousand pieces a day. They move with the troops, keeping a few miles in the rear, and it is said that they materially aid in keeping the sanitary conditions of the soldiers good.

How Napoleon would have marveled at the very idea of such a thing!

The Vorwaerts, the Berlin Socialistic paper, has made an estimate of the expenses of the war up to January 1, and arrives at the following conclusions as to the expenditures by the various powers:

Great Britain	$637,000,000
France	1,486,000,000
Russia	1,380,000,000
The other Allies	240,000,000
Germany and Austria	3,894,000,000

The expenses for a year at this rate would total the unimaginable sum of $16,676,000,000. In this sum are not included the economic losses of the various countries, nor the damage done to property in the various military terrains.

When it is said that the cost for one year of this

June 30, 1913, at face value, would only amount to a little more than half of this one year's cost of the present war.

Germany has issued further lists of casualties which bring the total to 877,107. This does not include the casualties of three of the federate states, nor is the total to which these lists are stated.

Austria has issued the 11th casualty list, which comes down to about two months ago, and shows 2,263 officers killed and 8,985 wounded, 628 captured; 40,827 killed, 231,160 wounded and 9,502 captured. The figures relating to the captured are manifestly far too low.

The movement of the Turkish army on Persia, which has resulted in their taking Tabriz and progressing further to the eastward, is causing Russia considerable anxiety.

Russia had extended her sphere of influence over northern Persia (a polite way of saying had made a conquest of it), and to be forced to treat therefrom is a serious blow to her prestige among the Persians; but even more important than this is this movement brings the Turks in a position from whence they can attack Baku and the Russian Persian oil fields, a region where Russia presumably has few troops.

The rest of the Russo-Turkish campaign is surrounded by considerable mystery, the bulletins contradicting each other absolutely. The probable ilitary operations in Poland and in Galicia, too, sd to be greatly hampered by weather condi- s. n Northern Poland, the Russians have launched offssive against Thorn in Prussia, in very con- rde force along the north bank of the Vistula. n in body of this force has reached the neigh- ol of Plock and its cavalry advance guard has ch a point some twenty miles from the objec- iorn.

The this advance was being thus made, a Ger- nce crossed the Vistula from the south and eed in establishing itself in the rear of this ssia force and between it and Warsaw, its base, e evident intention of cutting it off. The po- mas, however, not yet sufficiently developed to se the outcome. In the ex- n north of Poland there len heavy fighting near w with an apparently in- si result, both sides claim- e advantage. In East ssia itself, there has been e rious fighting, some un- ount skirmishes, and that ll parently a new campaign in Serbia has begun, an ia announcement to this cthaving been made at h, the temporary capital. i the week reports from last stated that many n of German troops were sig through that city des- or this attack, so that sation will be made by id force of Germans and stans.

ra London comes the an- nment that the following ti regiments have suffered t heavily in the war to e: The Bedfordshire, Berk- e/ Warwickshire, Worcester- e/ Leicestershire, Durham h infantry and the North- eand Fusiliers. There len no report for a long e of the total British cas- ti. These cannot be less n 10,000.

In the western battle line, fit at Soissons, briefly al- eo last week, turned out to be much more im- tat than first thought to be, and London ad- te quite frankly that this French defeat, a little th of Soissons, and their subsequent retreat os the River Aisne from a position which they lld for many weeks, was the most important n which had happened on the western battle line n this.

t appears that the German Emperor was present th fighting near Soissons, and by this and other indications the military critics abroad seem to con- sider that a resumption of the German offensive is foreshadowed, some going so far as to hint at the possibility of another German drive at Paris, from which Soissons is, as the crow flies, fifty miles away.

Another fact which seems to the critics important is that General von Kluck, the general whom the critics regard as the ablest commander on the Ger- man side in the western campaign, has taken com- mand of the troops at this point.

RECEIVING THE COVETED IRON CROSS FOR VALIANT SERVICE

There are two things, however, which militate against this theory: First, the Verdun-Toul line of defenses and fortifications is not in German possession, nor are the defending forces there so hemmed in as to be blocked; and, secondly, the real objective of the German campaign is not the possession of Paris or any other particular town or towns, but the destruction of the French field army.

If the taking of Paris would help the attainment of the real object, no doubt an effort would be made to take it, but the possession of that city, with the French field army still in being and unaffected by such taking, would be a source of weakness and not of strength. A large garrison drawn from the German army operating against the French army would have to be placed in the town, whereas, un- taken, the French are obliged to garrison it. In figures, therefore, its possession would weaken the Germans by about 200,000 men, and strengthen the St. Laurent and between Lille and Arras, but with unimportant results. These places are to the north- west of Soissons. On the rest of this western battle line the advantage during the week was consistently on the side of the Allies.

Near Nieuport on the Channel, the land and sea forces co-operating forced the Germans to with- draw the artillery they had mounted on the sand dunes, near the sea, to command the waters, a very considerable distance inland; and near Arras the British scored a very considerable ad- vance, inflicting heavy losses on the enemy.

Farther to the eastward the Allies gained some ground near Noyon and in front of Rheims. Near that storm- center St. Mihiel, the French made very considerable gains though los- ing a part towards the end of the week. There was severe fighting in the Argonne, which, however, resulted in little change in the situation, and in Alsace the positions remained un- changed. On the western battle-front the weather most of the week was bad and hindered all military move- ments.

Two airship raids took place dur- ing the week, one by the Germans on Yarmouth, with the alleged object of destroying the hangars located in that town, which was unsuccessful. Several other towns were visited, and the only results were a small loss of life and the destruction of a com- paratively insignificant amount of property. The other raid was by the Allies at Essen, Germany, and was directed against the Krupp Works there. No precise information as to the actual results attained has reached us as yet.

The specific reply to the American note to Great Britain on the subject of our shipping has not yet been received, and the situation has been complicated by two new cases, that of the Grien- brier and the Dacia. Fortunately, these matters will no doubt be amicably settled, as both parties are ap- proaching the discussion in a friendly spirit.

THE cases of the Grienbrier and the Dacia are more specifically mentioned on page 105. A third case has also arisen. On the afternoon of January 22 the American steamship Wilhelmina, owned by the Southern Products Trading Company of New York and chartered by the W. T. Greene Commission Company of St. Louis, sailed from New York for Hamburg with a cargo of general food products in- tended for non-combatants in Germany and con- signed to the branch office of the Greene Company in Hamburg. The whole question of the right of an- other government in time of war to seize American vessels carrying food products intended solely for a civilian population may be tested by this shipment, as it is believed in shipping circles that British officials will refuse to allow the Wilhelmina to enter any Ger- man port. The shippers, how- ever, declare that an affidavit was filed guaranteeing that the cargo should not be used for any but non-combatants, and state that the firm had every assurance that the cargo would reach Hamburg without hin- drance from British or French warships. The vessel is under the command of Captain Wil- liam Brewer of Philadelphia and has American officers and engineers, Spanish firemen and Scandinavian sailors. Secre- tary Bryan is quoted as having assured the shippers there ap- pears to be no reason why the cargo should be confiscated.— EDITOR.

A Battle at Nazareth?

IT HAS been reported that forti- fications have been erected on the hills above Nazareth in anticipation of the possibility of a great battle being fought there. There is something in this announcement to make the soul of a Christian shudder. Nazareth! The town where the boy Jesus lived; the town in which he labored as a car- penter and dwelt as a dutiful son; the town in which he read and prayed, receiving the wonderful mental and spiritual preparation for his mission.

Nazareth, home of the Prince of Peace, to hear the roar of cannonry; its people and their dwellings to suffer the woes of war.

If a battle does indeed take place at Nazareth it will, alas, not be the first time. In 1187 the town suffered severely in an attack by Saladin's forces, and in 1263 by Sultan Bibars. It suffered again when captured by the Turks in 1517. But it would be inexpressibly sad if after almost four hundred years of peace the streets and hills of the town of the Saviour's boyhood and young manhood should echo once more to the grim, savage sounds of war and witness its horrid sights.

WHAT THE FRENCH 75 MM. GUNS DID TO A GERMAN BATTERY

French by about the same number roughly speaking.

During the week the Germans followed up their victory near Soissons, in the western line of battle, by installing heavy artillery in the recently captured territory and beginning to shell the French positions on the bank of the Aisne. A severe struggle also took place at St. Paul, a hamlet a mile from Sois- sons, which, after being in the possession of both sides, finally remained in French hands.

There was also considerable fighting near Roye,

THE CHRISTIAN AND HIS COMPANIONS

A SERMON BY REV. C. A. MUTCH*

"Be not unequally yoked with unbelievers." II Cor. 6: 14

CHOOSING our companions is of vital importance to ourselves and to the kingdom of God. Our choice of companions has largely to do with our successes or failures in life. They will either prove a curse or a blessing. The normal man craves companionship. He wants sympathy; he needs friends. The burdens and the cares of life are many and often so heavy to bear that he needs the fellowship of others like himself, or similar to himself, to share his burdens. He needs the inspiration of their presence. There are few things so wearing as bearing burdens alone. There are few things that so completely sap our vitality and that so fill us with the gloom of despair and that so completely destroy all interest in life as the ceaseless grind of toil without the helpful association of others.

To avoid this breakdown as well as to gain in other matters, men seek pleasure and relaxation from toil by choosing congenial companions. But the choice is too frequently made without any reference to their moral character. We should never forget that we cannot escape the influence of those with whom we associate. This influence is either baleful or beneficial; it pulls us either downward or upward; we are made either worse or better. It becomes a part of us. It enters into our inner being and helps to mold and shape our character and plays an important part in fixing our destiny. We should remember that we can serve God and minister to the needs of the world at large quite as well in the choice of companions as in the right conduct of business. The demand is upon us and it is as imperative in the one as in the other. And yet how many sad mistakes have been made by wrong choice early in life! Multitudes have made shipwreck of faith and hope and love by simply choosing the wrong companions. Even though the loss is not so great as this, we cannot be what we might have been had our choice been better. "The memory of a festive hour will be sweet or bitter according to the companionship."

The Christian who deliberately chooses or associates with a worldly person will himself become worldly. One cannot touch corruption without contamination. One cannot play in the dirt without soiling the hands. St. Paul, in giving advice on this subject, says: "Good character is marred by evil company" (I Cor. 15: 33). It is to be feared that there are many in the churches today who were better Christians ten, twenty, or more years ago than now. Their spiritual declension is largely due to associates whose influence led them away from the straight path. In the choice of companions, we should be controlled by the same principles as those that should govern us in every other relation.

Ideal Companionships

THE right sort of associates are necessary to our own development. Our companions should be an inspiration to us so that we might do our best. One can never do his best alone. One cannot reach his highest development alone. In the conflict of life one may chase a thousand enemies and drive them off the field, and that is no mean achievement; but "two shall put ten thousand to flight"—one's power and efficiency being increased a hundred-fold. Our Lord sent out the seventy in companies of two. Each could comfort and help the other. We set up our companions as ideals. Some go so far as to imitate them in walking, manner of speech, voice, and even in modes of thought. How su-premely important it is that our ideals should be of the right kind! To choose the right companions we not only need the advice of those who are interested in us, but we need divine power as well as divine wisdom, if our "ideals shall be wrought into actual fact," and their "beautiful imagery shall become a living force." David might not have been the man he was without the companionship of Jonathan. That which gives that indescribable charm to the story of Ruth is the choice of companions she made. A young man or woman forecasts his or her future by the choice of associates.

* Pastor, Messiah United Brethren Church, Schuylkill Haven, Pa.

"Can two walk together, except they be agreed?" asks the prophet. He probably refers to that "affectionate manner of intimate friends in the East, who walk with one arm over the shoulders of the other." Now, walking together is a common act of human fellowship, indicating interchange of thought and opinion, and a desire to "keep step" with each other. Friendship naturally develops itself in unity of mind and pursuit. Enoch "walked" with God, so did Abraham, and the fact that they had chosen God for their Companion gives their names a power and inspiration that shall never cease. Their fellowship with him in the world assured them a more blessed fellowship in all the eternities to come. Our fellowship with men has much to do with our fellowship with God. Or, to put it conversely, our fellowship with God determines our fellowship with men.

The Line Between Success and Failure

OUR companions should be a support to us in times of need. There are times in one's life when he almost loses faith in men, and nearly loses his grip on God, as did Asaph (Ps. 73: 2). Nor did he get his bearings until he entered the sanctuary and communed with his ever-faithful Companion. Some of us, perhaps many, in thinking of the past, recall experiences which tested our loyalty severely. We tremble even now as we think of them. The temptation was to yield a little to the pressure of the foes of righteousness. From every side came the cry to be less firm in adhering to our convictions, to compromise with sin. Sometimes this blind, unreasoning opposition came from those on whom we had counted for support in the struggle against wrong. But, through the earnest solicitation of friends and companions in the kingdom, by their practical sympathy during the struggle, the temptation was overcome. Calamities seem never to come upon us singly, but in troops. We cry, but our voice is not heard; we pray, but the answer is delayed. How like a ministering angel is the presence and ministry of a true companion! Our troubled spirits were soothed into quietness as we listened to their words of cheer. As the tumultuous waves of Galilee were stilled by the voice of our Lord, so their words, their voice, their calm, confident manner quieted the waters upon whose bosom our souls had been tossed and tempest-driven.

In days of prosperity, too, we need the helpful ministry of our friends to keep us humble and in the fear of God, quite as much as in days of failure. Every one tries to get on in the world. No one wants to fail in attaining what is called a successful career. Within proper bounds, this is laudable; but in far too many cases, what is called success bears only the image and superscription of Cæsar. We have a very contracted view of life if we make mere worldly success the goal. If that is what we are striving for, to the exclusion of making a life, we fail in the main thing. To fail in that is to fail in all. Success is a greater test of character than failure. "When Jeshurun was kicked" (Deut. 32: 15). When our barns with plenty, it is comparatively easy to esteem the Rock of our salvation. There what the world calls success which gradually becomes unsympathetic, supercilious, out of touch with our fellows, especially with those whom we regard as our inferiors in ability. Such a full of peril. For some men, even a little is full of danger. It turns their head. Black, in his controversy with Robert In number of years ago, said: "A little knowledge is dangerous for a fool." If we substitute "success" for the word "knowledge," the statement is not impaired. In times from whatever source it may arise, it is a friend, the right sort of companion, who our help by advice, warning or reproof a out the better and the safer way.

Earthly and Heavenly Companionship

I HAVE said that our companions will be either a curse or a blessing to us. This statement can be verified in every community. We can call to mind some whose character was wrecked through sinful companions. I remember some whom I knew in earlier days, who saw in the things essential to life. They had opportunities as others; some of them superior advantages; but their lives have been under a cloud; and those who are still little promise of a better end. Their tragedy was almost entirely due to the choice of companions. A great majority of criminals end their lives in shame and disgrace because of their downfall has been largely due to bad company. One of this unfortunate class said: "Kiss me from bad company is the best message I can receive." Another left this message: "We were surrounded by as many friends as any fellow on the side, but when it came to a showdown, it was the church and our parents that stood by us."

Our companionships here should be a reflection of our companionships in heaven. David found influence as a Christian and missionary wide, though he spent only three short years in active service. A most potent influence which contributed to that end was his obedience to the will of God, when a lad of nineteen, to go with reverent and older people. Christian is our most precious possession. It develops slowly. It is the most beautiful thing in the universe. It is the finished product of Infinite grace and love, together with life's discipline. It is the greatest moral force in the world, except God. It is truth immutable and eternal incarnate in human life.

I repeat that aside from God and his grace there is nothing so potent for good as a companionship in manner, conduct and character. It creates within us a longing for the true and beautiful, for the things that are above. By companionship, we get foregleams of the company of the saints in light. It is an earnest shall be one of the delights in our Father of many mansions. "I am part of all that have met," said Ulysses. If that be true, how much more is it true of those whom we choose as companions and invite to share our joys, sorrows, our struggles and our victories. We value reputation, character, godliness; if we regard for the approval of the wise and we love God as we should, we will heed the teaching of the Scriptures: "Be not unequal yoked with unbelievers."

GOSPEL BREVITIES FROM MANY POINTS

—EVANGELIST HENRY OSTROM's California engagements are being postponed until spring on account of the failing health of his aged mother. He has diverted his itinerary to Winchester, Ky., where six churches have federated for evangelistic meetings. During the month of February he will assist the twenty-one federated churches of Salem, Ore.

—EVANGELIST EDWIN S. STUCKER, who has just closed successful meetings at McCook, Neb., goes next to Kerwin, Kan., and early in February to Gaylord. In both of these towns he had held successful meetings the year before, and he is hoping for even more successful gatherings in the coming campaign.

—PROFESSOR SAM HIGGINBOTTOM, who has been doing evangelistic work here on furlough from Ewing Christian College, Allahabad, India, sails from New York on the steamship Lusitania, January 30, with his family. Professor Higginbottom has delivered almost a thousand addresses in the interests of the agricultural folk, whom the college which he represents hopes to benefit by sending out teachers trained in modern methods of agriculture. He has found that his agricultural work has been a great help to his missionary endeavors and has high hopes for the furtherance of the kingdom, with the introduction of modern agricultural knowledge.

—RESULTS OF THE EVANGELISTIC campaign recently carried on in Watertown, N. Y., under the direction of Evangelist W. E. Biederwolf, have been widespread. They have not been confined to the city, but have reached out into remote parts of the county and into some of the adjoining counties as well. After a week of preaching to the church people, Mr. Biederwolf gave the invitation and from that time to the end of the meetings a stream of people came their way to the altar, determined to live for God. Along with people who came themselves to the service came many who the first time declared themselves as Christians as their personal Saviour.

—EVANGELIST W. H. VAN DEUSEN, Ind., lately completed three years' work in Oklahoma, Arkansas, Missouri, and Indiana. The evangelist and his wife, assisted by a corps of efficient workers, conversions are claimed during the past year and numbers have united with the church.

The Blessing and Discipline of Retirement

WEDNESDAY, February 7. Mark 6: 31. "Come ye yourselves apart and rest a while." And thus the Saviour himself took time to rest. He had only three years of public life, yet he made time for rest. He regarded rest as a vital element in his service. He sought the quiet of hills above in order that he might be refreshed for the comings and goings in the busy life below. He went aside into the green pastures to be refreshed for the next stage along the road. The retirement was a cordial and a balm for body, mind and soul. And if the world found time for the corrective rest, surely his disciples must follow him into refreshing fields.

Mr. Ruskin has told us that whenever he visited a great gallery of art, he found, after a time, that continual processing of changing colors had confused his eyes, and he lost the reason and sanity of his artistic discernments. He carried in his pocket a tablet of neutral hue, the natural color of the meadows, and he would turn his eyes upon it until the quietness of perception was restored. In a certain very wise way he went apart, and in the retirement he found new competency for his work. And surely on a rainy day, when the rush of life is so fierce, everything is so intense, when our besetting sins are so manifold, and often so glaring and glaring, it is imperative that we get apart and secure moral and spiritual vision. The strain from our powers and they need the rest of the rain. "He maketh me to lie down in the pastures: he restoreth my soul."

Drop thy still dews of quietness,
Till all our strivings cease;
Take from our souls the strain and stress,
And let our ordered lives confess
The beauty of thy peace.

Ministering Spirits

WEDNESDAY, February 8. Isaiah 6: 1-13. "Then flew one of the seraphim unto me." We know little of these mysterious beings. Their names are their burning purity. Evidently they belong to that order of ministering spirits who are fitted to minister to the heirs of salvation. Isaiah realized and confessed his sinfulness, of these sons of fire immediately felt an impulse towards him, because, though he had never admitted himself, he could at least recognize and accept in the prophet's confession a first step towards those shining levels of holiness on which his fellows stood. In that confession the spirit manifested itself that led them to cover their faces in the presence-chamber of God. He was so that the only solution for deep heart pain is to be found in the Altar of Atonement, where the blood of propitiation has been shed. The gift of Pentecost must follow on the Cross at last!

There is special teaching in the three-dimension of the wings of these holy beings. What twin they covered the face—there is rest. "With twain they covered the feet"—modesty and humility. "With twain they fly—there is instant obedience. "Bless the Lord, his angels that excel in strength, that do commandments, hearkening unto the voice of God." Whether to steady a sun or heal a heart, the seraphim are equally swift. Let us have their reverence, humility and instant obedience. Then we shall incite others to join in ceaseless ascription of "Holy, holy, holy."

The Right Uses of Money

WEDNESDAY, February 9. Deuteronomy 8: 18. "But thou shalt remember Jehovah thy God, for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth." The secret of the use of money depends upon our attitude towards it with the will of God, who only helps men to get wealth, but who also leads our Guide in spending it.

It may cause for us the tragedy of life, or self-indulgence, stimulate depraved appetites, corrupt business and politics; or it may be the means through which we may gain the ideal of character and service to others. It never says that wealth is wrong, intrinsically wrong, but he raises the danger signal, saying, in brief, that the effort after money and great possessions inevitably lays in a man's path a terrific opportunity to grow careless of his brother's need; it furnishes an arch-temptation to put second things first in the general conduct of a career.

The fixing of the attention upon money, Christ teaches, produces an ambition centered upon things that are impermanent; and when these things have captured a man's life, they determine the trend of that life and the spirit of all his endeavor.

As Jesus showed by his conversation with the rich young ruler, to give up the worship of mere possessions means something more than turning over money to the poor. It means the giving up or the changing of the central, regulating temper and disposition of the individual. This surrender or this change makes the man who is the servant of Mammon the servant of God, and money falls into natural relationship with the larger outlook.

The Master teaches in the Gospels that it is impossible to hold these two ideals of God and money in equal balance. One or the other must rule the life. Insomuch as life is more than meat and the body more than raiment he says, "Seek ye first his kingdom and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you."

The Five Gateways of the Spirit in Man

WEDNESDAY, February 10. John 3: 1-15. "That which is born of the Spirit is spirit." When the soul enters this world by the mystic gates of birth, it is provided with a body, which is a wonderfully contrived piece of machinery by means of which it is able to receive and communicate. Just as in the telephone there is the receiver and the transmitter, so the body is the apparatus by which the soul, through the five senses, receives the impressions of the outside world and transmits its decisions. Many people live and talk as though the body were themselves. There could not be a greater mistake. Don't pamper it, worry about it, or adorn it with extravagant care, any more than a lad would his bicycle. It is only a useful medium between the soul and the world on whose shore it has landed. Care for it that it may serve your purpose perfectly, but don't make it the end of your existence!

When we are born again, we become aware of another useful piece of apparatus, known as the spirit. It is to the unseen and eternal world what the body is to the material. It also has five gateways through which the impressions of the eternal are waited to us; and through the spirit the soul is able to make its response. "Then Samuel answered, Speak; for thy servant heareth." The one effort of most people is to make as much as possible of their contact with what is material and transient. They are earthly, fleshly, sensual, and often end by becoming devilish. Oh that all they who by faith have become babes in the spiritual world, may be equally keen to make the most of their environment, receiving its impressions and giving back their quick response!

God's Message to the Individual Soul

THURSDAY, February 11. Ezekiel 1: 3. "The word of Jehovah came expressly unto Ezekiel . . . and the hand of Jehovah was there upon him." Nebuchadnezzar had overcome the people of Judah. He had given them a vassal king who had rebelled against him. Then, to subdue Judah, he had drafted ten thousand of the first men of Babylon and sent them working on the banks of the Chebar. Among these men was the young Ezekiel, and while he was by the river at his toil, he had one day a vision that set him apart and made him a prophet—a prophet of the individual soul—"the heavens were opened and I saw visions of God."

Isaiah and Jeremiah were prophets of the nation; a kind, religious imperialism runs through all their works. Now as the nation is humbled and its best sons taken captive, there arises a prophet, not of the nation, but of the individual, and he called the people not to national but to personal righteousness.

Tolstoi once said, "Every age must have an interpretation of religion in its own language, in order that you as an individual may know that it means you." Ezekiel, the prophet of the private soul, came to his people in captivity and said, "There is a personal force in the will, energized and supported by God, that can withstand any adversity or ill-fortune, a force that can modify and change the power of outer circumstances, that can resist and conquer adverse environments."

Today I would stop to think of the dignity of my own soul. I would comprehend the possibilities of my own spiritual personality to rise above every impending earthly obstacle, corporate or national. I may be a captive by some River Chebar, I may be far from home and bound to disagreeable tasks, but my soul is free. My soul is the connecting link between me and God.

Open to my eyes the heavens, O God, that I for myself may see "visions of God."

The Leading of the Spirit in Our Hearts

FRIDAY, February 12. Ephesians 3: 11-21. "Able to do . . . according to the power that worketh in us." The apostle's prayer has to do with deeper depths in us than can be plumbed by the human mind. "They pass understanding," i. e., when our understanding seeks to keep pace with the intuitions of the spirit, it soon tires, its wings droop, its pace slackens, and it ultimately drops behind; whilst the heart expands beneath the pressure of its glorious revelations. As well might a sparrow keep pace with an eagle. "I knew a man in Christ, caught up into Paradise, who heard unspeakable words."

It would appear as though the apostle then turns to meet the objection that he was asking more than he could expect his converts to obtain. He replies that it is not so, because God is able to do all that his Spirit suggests in the heart which prays. "In my prayer," he seems to say, "I have become conscious of the throes of a greater conflict than can be accounted for by a pastor's anxiety. God's own Spirit is suggesting my petitions, and firing my earnestness; and I know that the power which waits to fulfil my prayer is as great as that which suggests it." We remember that the height of the rising Nile, as measured by the nilometer at Cairo, indicates the area which is being covered by the flood, and also indicates the resulting harvest. But that is not all. We can ask much, but we can think more. What may not a man think when his heart is filled with the love of God at a flood! But the Father can do exceeding abundantly above all, and in such a matter his ability is at the disposal of his love.

The Soul Strengthened in Solitude

SATURDAY, February 13. Matthew 14: 23. "And when the evening was come, he was there alone." "Yet I am not alone," said Jesus; "my Father is with me." Solitariness is one of the qualities of great geniuses. Washington and Lincoln had lonely periods in their lives. They were often misunderstood and maligned, but, being girded with infinite strength, their moral greatness stood the test, and shines today in silent grandeur. The father and savior of the American republic are embalmed in the hearts of their countrymen. They bore the burdens of a nation, as Jesus did of the whole world. They had their Gethsemanes of sorrow and loneliness, while men plotted against the nation. They drank the cup of calumny and criticism to its dregs. Now, like their Master, "they belong to the ages."

Washington and Lincoln stand foursquare before mankind, reflecting gentleness, truthfulness, majesty and goodness, filling the divine requirements to "do justice, love mercy and walk humbly with thy God." These noble Christian patriots are not alone now. Monuments proclaim them, memories recall them, multitudes pattern after them, hearts crown them. Their name and fame are the possession of present and future generations.

"THIS book of the law . . . thou shalt meditate in day and night. My soul shall be satisfied . . . when I meditate upon thee in the night watches. . . . I will meditate also on all thy work, and talk of all thy doings. My hands also will I lift up unto thy commandments, which I have loved; and I will meditate in thy statutes. The glory of the Lord shall endure forever. . . . My meditation of him shall be sweet. . . . The judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether. More to be desired are they than gold. . . . In the keeping of them there is great reward. . . . Let the words of my mouth, and the meditations of my heart, be acceptable in thy sight, O Lord, my strength, and my Redeemer."

KEEPING up with the remarkable development of San Francisco's Chinese quarter since the disaster of 1906, the Sunday schools of the "New Chinatown" have grown in numbers and developed in methods until they compare favorably in nearly all respects with their American counterparts. This quarter of San Francisco is the greatest center of Chinese in America. Everything in its streets speaks of progress and the adoption of American customs. On one corner of Stockton Street is the Methodist church. Near by is a modern hotel and next to it the Chinese Nationalist League of America. Across the street is the Chinese Y. M. C. A. Churches of practically all denominations have religious directors in the city for the Oriental work, and the larger denominations have buildings in the heart of Chinatown where are located the church and Sunday school rooms, night and day school headquarters, dormitories and social halls.

The Presbyterian Church and Sunday school occupies a large building on Stockton Street, the second thoroughfare of importance in Chinatown. In this Sunday school, which in nearly every respect is modern, the superintendent, a young Chinaman, presides and is assisted by the pastor, Dr. Laughlin of Berkeley. Eight classes have separate quarters for their lesson periods. Some of the teachers are American and some are Chinese. Both languages are used in different parts of the service. Memory verses and the closing prayer are given in English and in Chinese. In the class taught by the American pastor, the boys all speak very good English.

In the Baptist Sunday school, each pupil buys his own material for the class work. Many of the teachers in this school are American women and men from other Sunday schools of San Francisco. In the basement of the church building there is a large social hall with a piano and a long reading table with many magazines and newspapers in English and Chinese. The son of the present Chinese consul general in San Francisco is one of the members of a young men's class in this school. The school has been in operation for twenty-six years, the average attendance being about one hundred.

While standing at an upper window of the Baptist Sunday school, my attention was attracted to the streets below, where a funeral procession of a wealthy Chinaman was passing. It was a heathen funeral. First in the procession was an open cab, with a large portrait of the dead man in the back. Surmounting this was a dove, which is supposed by the heathen worshippers to carry the spirit away to heaven. Next came a number of limousines and carriages of mourners, with a procession of friends and relatives marching behind, in two columns, the relatives dressed in sackcloth in one line, and the other mourners dressed in black and walking beside them. The costume of the relatives consisted of loose white robes with strips of sackcloth down the front and back. The most novel feature of the whole equipage was a carriage of musicians at the end of the procession, whose duty it is to drive away all evil spirits.

There were all kinds of instruments which combined to make an unearthly din and confusion of noises. Everything, from the weird strains of the oboe to the dismal thumping of a tom-tom, seemed to be used in the effort to scare away the spirits of evil.

and socials are held at intervals. Some of the features of the service itself are American and some Chinese. A Chinese girl played the organ and a choir of ten Chinese boys, under sixteen, sang anthems in English. The Scripture reading and discussion of the lesson by the superintendent was in the Oriental tongue. Girls of sixteen came into the room, clad in beautifully woven costumes of colored silk with pantaloons underneath. Even with this costume the Chinese shoe was worn, and white pumps of the American style were worn. The dress seem to be hopeless!

The Congregational Sunday school like all the other leading schools in Chinatown—is self-supporting. The teachers but one are Chinese and women. Rev. Chin K. T. aggressive superintendent. These Sunday schools are enterprises of their own in a sionary field, just as the leaders of the American schools are doing. Sunday school has been in more than sixteen years.

In a Christmas program the Congregational Sunday members presented a play, with a member of the school, who staff of a local Chinese paper, parts of Santa Claus, Jack fairies, elves and bootblacks played by the Chinese young people.

Coming out of such place Nationalist League club room be seen Chinese men well in up-to-date American clothes. They may be followed by older men in typical Chinese shoes and jackets, trousers of somber black. School children wear American clothes, some are dressed from head to toe in the bright-colored Oriental Girls, up to sixteen or so, wear the garb of their native while those over that age, are dressed in the costume of their sisters. Naturally, the older men generally adhere to Chinese and the young men are eager to adopt the American ways.

Here and there in the neat center of San Francisco are buildings which preserve Oriental features. Joss houses remain, almost side by side with Christian churches, and are guides of the quarter as points of interest. None but the Chinese, know to what extent they are used as places of heathen worship. The old Chinatown there was a percentage of Chinese who could speak English when accosted in the streets. Children, now growing under the influence of the Sunday schools and Sunday schools, speak English fluently and with little difficulty American language, manners and ideals.

BILLY SUNDAY IN WASHINGTON

ACCOMPANIED by about twenty-five of the workers who have been helping him in his great Philadelphia campaign, Evangelist Billy Sunday visited Washington, D. C., on January 18. A delegation of one hundred churchmen and clergymen of the national capital welcomed the evangelist at the Union Station, and a huge crowd outside gave him a vociferous greeting. At 2 o'clock in the afternoon, Mr. and Mrs. Sunday, with the other members of the Philadelphia party, together with the local committee, visited the President and were received in the East Room of the White House. Secretary Bryan presented the visitors. President Wilson expressed great interest in the evangelist's work, and the two chatted familiarly.

Later the same afternoon, Mr. and Mrs. Sunday and their children took tea with Secretary Bryan, who has been personally acquainted with the evangelist for many years.

The evangelist was scheduled to speak in Convention Hall at 4.15, but it was fully a half hour later before the service began. He spoke to an audience of over 5,000 persons, many of them well known in official life, including cabinet officers, diplomats, senators, representatives and high government officials. His text was Luke 19: 1: "Jesus entered and passed through Jericho," and for a full hour he held his auditors while he delivered one of his characteristic sermons. Occasionally he was wrought up to a pitch of excitement, and spoke with rapid emphasis, accompanied by many of his familiar expressions and attitudes; but his language was unusually conservative. It was the same, yet a "different" Billy Sunday; less vivid and startling, but no less earnest and spiritual than the man who had stirred Philadelphia to its depths. It was evident that he felt himself to be before an audience differing in many respects from the customary revival crowd. He devoted the principal part of his discourse to holding up Jesus as a model for men of every condition in life, whether they were disposed to admit it or not.

"If Jesus should come to Washington," he said, "where would you want him to find you? At some tango tea, where the women don't wear enough clothes to make a tail for a kite or a pad for a crutch? . . . It is heaven or hell for everybody. There is no half-way. . . . If Jesus came, what changes would you make in your life? I am putting it up to you people. His judgment is not based upon what he reads in the Congressional Record. He has seen with a practiced eye the elements of justice and injustice that moved the crowd. He has been at the council table of every great corporation, and he knows when property rights are being put above human rights. He knows the motives behind the act of every man since this nation was founded."

There was the usual flow of Sunday epigrams throughout the sermon. "Christianity is a personal matter—personal to you." "If I could save America, there wouldn't be a guilty soul go out of here on its way to hell!" "If Jesus Christ came to Washington, he would be stoned as he was in Jerusalem. Oh, I'd like to think he would be treated differently, but it's not a hundred to one shot. I would not have to go without the corporate limits of Washington to find people who would crucify him." Again he said: "When you turn your back on Jesus Christ, you assassinate your character. We all need Jesus Christ—all of us—the President in the White House, the speaker, the Congress, the Supreme Court—all need Christ as well as the street sweeper." Here he read again the words of his text and continued: "Christ is here. He was before Washington was ever named; before Clay rode here on horseback from Kentucky; before Thomas Jefferson came. He never has been. He has heard every lie; seen every false; known every corrupt practice, and every pure thought. He knows! He knows! If you were coming here this afternoon, would you change any dates? Would you tell her you come, or tear up some letters, or draw a check? Would you owe? Would you tell the wagon not to come around any more? Would you? Or would you say, as did the statesman when he was asked what he would do if he had to die in twenty-four hours: 'I'd do it just as on other days.'"

There is now a fair probability that Billy Sunday may be asked to visit New York and series of evangelistic services. At a meeting of Methodist ministers held in New York on January 18, a proposition to invite Mr. Sunday was the subject of an animated discussion. One or two pastors present are said to have opposed action on the ground that their congregation object to the evangelist and his methods. In favor of the proposition, however, were decided the majority. Bishop Thomas B. Neely said he believed Sunday's "tendency is wholesome," results he achieved were good, and Rev. D. Guthrie of Wilkesbarre also warmly defended the evangelist. After the passage of the resolution a committee was appointed to go to Philadelphia to make the necessary arrangements. A number of clergymen and laymen of the Presbyterian, Reformed and other denominational churches in New York will unite with the committee in issuing the invitation.

UNEMPLOYMENT A NATIONAL PROBLEM

VARIOUS SOLUTIONS SUGGESTED AT THE AMERICAN LABOR ASSOCIATION CONVENTION

ON DECEMBER 28 and 29, 1914, the American Association for Labor Legislation held its annual convention at the Walton Hotel, Philadelphia. Closely affiliated with this union is the Association on Unemployment, the meetings were practically part of the convention. The purpose of the organization is to standardize the best experience at home and abroad on the many problems of labor and make practically available for American needs. At the time it aims to rouse general interest, so that a program may become part of public conscience and law. Under the leadership of Dr. H. F. Seager of Columbia University and Dr. and Mrs. J. B. Andrews, its secretaries, it has become, probably, the most effective and comprehensive single agency in the country for solving the many problems of unemployment not in the interest of a class, but of the people.

The last part of the session was devoted to consideration of Workmen's Compensation laws in operation. Pennsylvania came in for a rebuffing as one of the leading industries that fell far short of making adequate provision for its injured workmen. Dr. H. F. Seager, in a letter, expressed his determination to stand by the campaign for an advanced compensation discussion of the scale of compensation to be paid out some interesting facts and reasons. As it is now, it is largely arbitrary. It was stated that the Federal Government paid its employees $25 to $50 for the loss of an arm, $25 for an arm; for both arms, not the $50; for the loss of both legs $375. In New Jersey $250 was paid to a boy for the loss of a foot, while nearly one-half of New York injured workmen were not entitled to more than $5 compensation per week and only 1 per cent. to more than $20. There was a general agreement that the existing scale is not sufficient to keep a family from want. A suggestion was made that the standard of compensation should be based on the needs of the family. On that scale would be measured, not by earnings, but by the needs of the case. A sliding scale was proposed—perhaps for the first time in history—the man with a family to receive proportionately more than the single man. All in all, the discussion of unemployment brought up the most important note was the criticism of the present system. As Meyer London strikingly put it, "The future historian, looking back to our time, will call this the age of disorder, the age of confusion. Industry is not organized so that it will work smoothly and continuously. It works by fits and starts, at times working every available man and again throwing a great number on the resources. Neither the municipality, nor the state, nor the Federal Government arranges its work with a view to fit in and tide over seasons of general depression. A great part of the blame falls on the consumer, the American woman especially, who, it was remarked, has gone "crazy on styles, making necessary a revolution in industry every two or three months." As was pungently said by one of the speakers: "If women desire to be stupid and silly, they ought to be willing to pay for it." A warning note was sounded that order would have to come out of chaos, or individual freedom and action would be lost entirely in Socialism.

Pitiful conditions were brought out in the reports of investigations conducted by the associations. One report dealt with the building and shoe trades. It re-emphasized what students of the labor problem have known for a long time, viz., that the building trades, after their season is over, carry 20, 30, even 40 per cent. of their men unemployed. A great proportion are unskilled and have received wages inadequate to tide them over the winter months, so that they suffer actual privation. As a complication to the lack of continuous work, there is an actual oversupply of men. These could perhaps be used in succession at different tasks, if the unions had not organized into an unreasonable number of trades—at times really identical—out of which the men are not allowed to go for work.

It appeared that these are not isolated cases. Relief agencies in New York, Philadelphia and other large cities are strained to the utmost in trying to meet conditions this winter that have seldom been paralleled. The drift of the problem is toward human misery. The other side is the wastefulness of the present situation. In Pennsylvania the annual loss through unemployment was estimated at $250,000,000, excluding mines, public utilities and smaller industries. To that must be added the loss in human efficiency, for unemployment deteriorates the man mentally, physically and morally, many to such an extent that they never come back. The soberness of statements tended to drive home the overwhelming seriousness of America's struggle to give every man the right and opportunity to live.

If the analysis of the situation was thorough and complete, equally so were the remedies proposed. The first in order, if not in actual importance, was to give the young a fair start in life. If much of the unemployment falls to the lot of the unskilled, and if theirs is most of the suffering, then it is clear that a higher average standard of skill among those starting out in industry will lessen the amount of unemployment and minimize its suffering. Co-operation of schools, health boards and public employment agencies was urged to guide the young in finding vocations that are lasting and offer a fair competence. It was held that a sane policy of vocational guidance in continuation schools would drain off, to a large extent, the supply of non-skilled, underpaid, casual workers, who form a great part of the problem, while the smaller number remaining would find work more plentiful and continuous.

The main suggestions for a constructive solution of unemployment were two: To regularize industry and organize the labor market. It is interesting to note that both have been tried and found successful on an extensive scale in England and Germany. The plan proposes a more liberal and intelligent understanding and co-operation between consumer, retailer and manufacturer. Instead of buying at the last moment, or encouraging ever-changing, extravagant fashions, or entering cut-throat competition for a momentary larger output, every factor should be brought to eliminating the disturbing elements, and that would give opportunity to plan work for longer periods in such a way that the men would be employed continuously and enabled to live.

The other feature of the plan is to organize the labor market through public employment bureaus. These public employment bureaus are designed to keep accurate record of the men applying for work, as well as of conditions in the various industries throughout the country. With proper organization a change from job to job could be made without loss of time.

To deal with surplus labor in seasons of depression, it was proposed that the national, state and municipal governments arrange public work to fit in those seasons. At present public work stops when industry is slack. Instead, the government ought to become a model employer, as well as to offer work to all able-bodied willing workers, to tide them over dull times. As a second remedy, to meet the want of off-seasons unemployment, insurance was proposed. Workman, employer and the government could contribute to a fund in good times which would be sufficient to keep the worker and his family from suffering when employment is not to be had. It is this plan which has been tried with marked success on the continent of Europe, at an expense that is ridiculously low, compared with the great amount of good it does.

Dr. H. Seager has been re-elected president for 1915, and Mr. J. B. Andrews will again serve as secretary. The executive committee includes Jane Addams, Louis Brandeis of Boston, Samuel Gompers, Felix Warburg, New York; Woodrow Wilson and others.

DO YOU KNOW YOUR BIBLE?

WE ARE glad to announce the following winners of prizes for the Bible contests of 1914:

The following eight receive each a book or set of books as first prize, having had correct answers for nine of the twelve question lists of 1914:

Mrs. F. Avery, Mrs. O. C. Barnes, Mrs. J. B. Seager, Mrs. Susan A. Glover, Mrs. A. McMannigal, Mrs. W. C. Ward, Mrs. Clement T. Paull, Mrs. Edwin D. Ward.

The readers won second prizes, having had ten correct lists:

Mrs. I. P. Calkins, Jennie Cunningham, Mrs. A. Jackson, Mrs. A. Ferguson, John A. Freeman, Mrs. M. D. Harris, Mrs. W. C. Seager, Hilda B. Langille, Mrs. W. C. Minnaux, J. N. Ogle, Mary E. Seager.

The following friends win the prize of $100 for the special half-year contest, having had perfect answers for the questions of the last six lists. The following is presented one of the rare clay tablets described in previous issues of the Christian Herald:

Mrs. A. F. Avery, Mrs. O. C. Barnes, Mrs. Louis A. Black, Jennie Cunningham, Adelia Forsythe, Mrs. Susan A. Glover, Delia M. D. Harris, Mrs. W. M. Michaux, Miss W. Nicholson, Mrs. Clement T. Paull, Mrs. Edwin D. Ward, Mrs. Anna S. Waugh, Mrs. L. M. West.

New Questions for 1915

The Bible lessons for 1915 will be about the letters of Paul. We shall study the towns and the people to whom he wrote, linking up his messages in the letters with the incidents recorded in the Acts. Questions will be prepared with the desire to make the places and people, particularly the friends and companions of Paul and the members of his various flocks in the towns in which he preached, seem real and fascinating. We shall study Paul the man and neighbor, as well as Paul the debater and theologian. The course will be found more interesting if accompanied with a study of Dr. Clark's book In the Footsteps of St. Paul. In studying the Epistles the order of the English versions is not followed. This order seems to have been based chiefly upon the length of the Epistles, not the time of their writing. In this course we shall study the Epistles in the order in which they are believed by the best New Testament scholars to have been written.

Prizes will be awarded on the same basis as formerly. We cannot yet announce whether arrangements will be made for a special half-year contest. Start in at once and make up your mind to win a prize this year. The contest is open to all. Answers must reach the Christian Herald office within two weeks from date of the issue in which the questions appear. Address: Bible Contest Department, Christian Herald, Bible House, New York.

Question List No. 1

First and Second Thessalonians

[It is interesting to note that modern Salonica, a town of one hundred and eighty thousand inhabitants, is the very same city to whose little group of Christians Paul wrote these letters long ago. Its present Christian churches are doubtless the outgrowth of the church Paul founded there in the first century.]

1. (a) What two companions accompanied Paul on his first visit to Thessalonica and later joined with him in writing letters to the Christians there? [Note that the name of one of these friends appears in the letters in a different form than that used in the Acts.] (b) How many Sabbaths did Paul preach in the Jewish synagogue?

2. (a) What expression in the narrative in the Acts shows there were many converts from those who were not Jews? (b) What expressions in the Epistles refer to the fact that some of the converts were formerly heathen?

3. (a) In whose house did Paul live while in Thessalonica? (b) What verses in the Epistles show that he worked for his own support while in the city?

4. After leaving Macedonia, at what city did Paul wait for his companions to join him? [It is believed that it was from this city that Paul wrote the first letter to the Thessalonians.]

5. (a) Who went from Athens to Thessalonica as a messenger from Paul? (b) What were the purposes of this errand? (Mention three.)

6. What report did this messenger bring of the Thessalonian Christians? [It is thought that this report was brought to Paul at Corinth, Acts 18: 5, and that it was from this city that he wrote his second letter to the Thessalonians.]

7. (a) For what special reason did Paul wish greatly to see the Thessalonian Christians again? (b) Quote two verses from one chapter of the first Epistle and one from another

Providence and the Earthquake

ALONG with the extreme grief and horror felt throughout the world at the Italian earthquake, in which nearly fifty thousand lives were lost, came, to many Christian minds, the old haunting wonder: "How could God have allowed it to take place?"

Usually the discussion of such questions is devoid of profit. The devout heart exclaims: "Therefore will not we fear though the earth be removed, and though the mountains be carried into the midst of the sea: though the waters thereof roar and be troubled, though the mountains shake with the swelling thereof."

Christians feel and know that beneath and above all the clamor and havoc of rocking worlds there abide such never-failing things as love and hope and faith.

But sometimes a word dropped will make the opening for a flood of light. None of the explanations offered may be the correct one, but they indicate at least that there is a true explanation and that it could be found if our information and intelligence were comprehensive enough to reach it.

For instance, some have suggested that the earthquake will likely keep Italy out of the war. We see at once that of the two national calamities, war or earthquake, the earthquake is the less.

But some have even connected the present disaster with the war. A learned professor, Dr. Alois Kaehlin, formerly of the University of Halle, has advanced the idea that the quakes may have been caused by the shock waves of the cannonading of Europe's battles and sieges. "It is a well-known principle," he is reported to have said, "that concussions of any kind produce waves similar to those created by wireless apparatus. The only difference is that the electric waves travel through the atmosphere, while the shock waves radiate underneath the ground."

Surely if a spark and a flash can be transmitted and recorded for three thousand miles in the air, the terrific detonation of guns might be believed to be transmitted through the earth for a few hundred miles. If this theory has any value, we feel at once the incongruity of blaming the Almighty for results caused by bellicose men.

Geologists explain that the quakes were caused by the resettling of the earth after long volcanic disturbance. There are faults or breaks in the strata of the earth's crust, and these breaks are subject to readjustment, particularly after large quantities of rock have been thrown out in the form of lava. The inflexible laws of gravity hold good, and as the ground settles back into place, buildings and towns on the surface are destroyed. Professor Kaehlin pointed out that this section of Italy is the weakest spot in the peninsula, and that the shock waves of which he spoke would naturally seek their outlet there, at the point of least resistance.

Meanwhile the hearts of the Christian world are bowed with new grief over this fresh calamity, and pray that the stricken people of Italy, in the midst of their bewilderment and grief and the doubt of the permanency of all things, may feel that underneath them are the everlasting arms, and that God will still cause to abound among their souls and homes his never-failing grace.

The New Jersey Strike Tragedy

THE strike tragedy at Roosevelt, N. J., where sixteen men, not all of them strikers, were shot down by a posse of deputy sheriffs on January 19, is attracting public attention, second only in extent to that which was awakened by the Colorado strike a year ago. In the New Jersey case there was the same reckless and unauthorized use of firearms as in the Western strike, but there were marked differences in other respects. It has been claimed that the deputies employed in the interest of the fertilizer company were acting under no proper or responsible authority; that they were men wholly unfit to be called upon to preserve the peace anywhere, and that they fired wantonly upon unarmed strikers, who were not prepared for violence and were taken unawares. After the first volley it is said the strikers scattered like sheep before their assailants; several were shot in the back while endeavoring to escape and some were "sniped" after the general fusillade had ceased. Twenty-two of the deputies have been held on $2,000 bail each to answer a charge of manslaughter in the Jersey courts.

This unfortunate affair is the latest illustration of the evil of permitting any set of employers to engage private armed forces to the peril of human lives. Had New Jersey authorized the organization of a trained state constabulary on the model of the Pennsylvania organization, it would have been able to cope with such a situation in all probability without bloodshed. A bill to create a state constabulary was defeated in the New Jersey legislature last year, but will now probably be revived, the advantages of such a force being too obvious to call for comment.

There should be in each of the great industrial states a disciplined force with authority to deal with such a situation promptly when it arises, and whose training would enable them to do this without losing their heads, as the New Jersey deputies evidently did when they fired into a crowd of unarmed strikers. But even apart from the humanitarian aspects of the case, it is clearly wrong in principle to permit private citizens to engage armed bands to defend their property and to set up a local state of war. The power of life and death should be rigidly confined to the higher authorities, and not left to be exercised at will by any hurriedly organized posse of deputy sheriffs or private detectives.

The Price of Bread Must Not Be Raised

PRESENT-DAY events are constantly emphasizing the fact that the interests and activities of the nations of the world are becoming more and more closely intertwined. War, instead of demonstrating that nations can be independent of one another, demonstrates rather their close interdependence. But a bird's-eye view of the war would just now be most distressing. We find one continent embroiled in battles and other continents engaged in sharp and strenuous strife for commercial advantage. Strange to say, the fight with guns in Europe has much to do with the fight for dollars in America. American business men are constantly yielding to the temptation to coin gain out of Europe's woes.

Wheat has been going up. It was going up because of the enormous exportations of wheat to Europe to feed the people whose ordinary agricultural and commercial pursuits had been interrupted by the war. The fact that wheat was rising on the produce exchanges was a positive indication that the price of bread also would soon rise; and when the price of bread rises every family in the country is interested—and the majority of families are alarmed.

A lady in New York, Mrs. Julian Heath, head of a National Housewives' League, telegraphed President Wilson asking him to stop the exportation of wheat to Europe, declaring that it was needed for home consumption. In little more than fifteen minutes after the news was received in Chicago that this suggestion of a New York woman might be acted upon by the authorities in Washington, the price of wheat fell five cents a bushel. Still later, on the same day, President Wilson ordered the attorney-general to conduct an inquiry into the rising price of wheat and the expected rise in the price of bread.

In view of the gratifying reports of bountiful harvests and an enormous wheat yield there could be no possible excuse for such an advance in the price of the "staff of life." The Christian Herald some weeks ago stated its opinion of those business men who would try to manipulate conditions arising out of the war in Europe to their personal profit. It is to be earnestly hoped that the federal investigation and its report will effectively put an end to advancing prices of wheat, flour and bread.

A Boy Who Loved Trees

MANY years ago an immigrant family made a home in the Wisconsin wilds. They faced the hardships of pioneer life courageously; the father a stern, just man, the boys sturdy and enthusiastic lads who did not flinch at hard work. All around them was wilderness; virgin soil to be broken, forests to be cleared, every hour from daylight to dusk fully occupied. One of the boys at eleven was his father's right hand in all his labors. He was a boy of the type the poet knew who wrote "the thoughts of youth are long, long thoughts." He rose earlier than the others that he might have time for study; books and tools were his constant companions. In those early morning hours he developed a faculty of invention, and with his jack-knife and plane made several contrivances which the neighbors persuaded his father the state fair at Madison, where, to the delight, his exhibits were accepted.

This was the beginning of the wonderful John Muir. Supporting himself by farm work went to study at the State University, little more than a dollar a week. But thoughts were among the woodlands, the Sierras and the giant trees. A lover of longed to explore the mysterious ranges, a time he slept in the woods beside a car-twig, and with only a blanket for cover diet was the simplest. He became a hunter, and explored the Sierra Nevada, woods and the vast Yosemite, which at were practically undisturbed by the foot of man. He made a study of glaciers and wrote of saw. By and by the scientific world began notice of the young explorer and to read of the great wilderness. But young Muir more than write; for ingenuity is needed plorer would live in the wilds. He could saw-mill, make a clock or a cabin, and co-bed that would discharge its occupant b him over at a certain hour; but the great heart was reserved for the trees. He al-shipped them, and it is due largely to his woods and to his tireless labors in their be the vast forests of the West have been sav American people. "It took more than th sand years to make some of these trees in ern woods," he once wrote. "Through all derful and eventful centuries since Chri and long before, God cared for those tre them from drought, disease, avalanches and sand tempests and floods; but he cannot s from fools—only Uncle Sam can do tha through his influence they were saved an day the heritage of the people. To him t owes the preservation of the giant redw Yellowstone Park—the finest public pleasur in the world—and the glorious Yosemite V of which ruthless commerce, in its hunt fo might have turned into a desert.

John Muir's name and fame have been i ser in the history of our Western wonderla Muir Glacier was named after him. H was dreamer, an enthusiast, who cared little many regard as the material prizes of life bul was a true child of nature, one of those gr spirits whom we too often fail to recogn they have left us. He did the whole nation that will not soon be forgotten.

What "America" Said

OUR Catholic contemporary, Ameri, in a note from the editor of that jour, call our attention to a misquotation in t Christian Herald of December 2 of a ardu which appeared in America's issue of Ocer entitled: "Another Subsidy." As a matter (simp justice, we give America's article below, re ecting any inaccuracy in our quotation, which wa imple due to inadvertence, and in no sense desed obscure or misinterpret the original.

ANOTHER SUBSIDY

Some few weeks ago our government sent the S jion Turkey, carrying $200,000 of public money to Protet institutions. A few days since the nation's purse was ol again, and this time $75,000 slipped into the coffers sim institutions in Asia. The New York Sun announces is the of news as follows:

"WASHINGTON, October 15.—For the relief of Ame missionaries in Turkey in Asia the cruiser North Carolin ordered to proceed to the port of Alexandria to get gold, which is to be distributed under the direction Ambassador Morgenthau.

"The gold will be taken by the North Carolina to fl transported thence to Jerusalem for distribution. T go part of the sum appropriated by Congress for the relief Americans stranded in the war zone."

How interesting! How kind! How apostolic! it cruel! for, were not the real American citizens so bu a certain Catholic candidate for the office of governor connections concerning the use of public money for purposes, they would lie awake at night fretting over dents, or falling asleep, their slumbers would be dist vision of an "evangelical" tie in the presidential cl administration should take pity on real American These continual violations of "the character of our violable liberties, signed with the blood of our illust bears—"all said in one breath"—will prostrate real citizens and there will be nobody left to 'preserve' palladium." Meantime, even while we write, the w expanding enormously. Turkey in Europe, two w Turkey in Asia now. Thibet next, India after that, n haps Norway, and later, perchance, Iceland. Worm Learns by Experience

THE department of zoology at Harvard recently, in its experimentations, undertook to find out certain things about the worm family which they suspected but of which were not quite certain. A worm was put in a box with two holes cut in it through which it could crawl in and out. Across the path leading to the hole would naturally use, there was a wire connected with electricity. The worm crossed the wire and got the shock. He tried again and took the same shock. The third time he had the same experience. He only needed three lessons, and he became wise. He never tried that door again, ways went out and in by the one that had proved in front of it. This worm, which the professors call "One-Eyed Pete," might teach some people who never learn by experience, people who run up against the same snag, butt their heads against the same stone wall of opposition, be killed by the same electric current of warning over and over again with no wisdom learned by experience. One of his terrific contrasts between the greatness of God and the littleness of man, Job thus said to a worm: "How much less man, that won't learn? and the son of man, which is a worm?" (Job 25: 6.)

Vellesley Arises from Ashes

OLD cornerstone, recently recovered from the ruins of the buried College Hall of Wellesley, laid January 15 by Bishop Lawrence as the cornerstone of the central dormitory of the new Wellesley Hall quadrangle, the first building of the new Wellesley. After the stone-laying, addresses were made in the chapel by Bishop Lawrence, Rev. George H. Palmer, President Ellen F. Allen and Miss Candace C. Stimson of New York City, chairman of the Alumnae Committee. Wellesley begins to arise out of her ashes a larger and more beautiful institution than was destroyed by the flames. As if by magic, $30,000 of new endowment has been raised since the last year. The Rockefeller Foundation gave $200,000, the General Education Board $200,000, Mr. Rockefeller $95,000, and other contributors $140,000. Perhaps the most generous gift, in proportion to that of $200,000 contributed by young graduates, undergraduates and their parents, in amounts from $5 to $100. The building destroyed by fire will be replaced by fireproof structures. There is a fresh endowment. Wellesley has a splendid foundation in the heroism of the girls in the fire, and in the self-sacrificing contributions of the graduates out of scanty earnings. In the cornerstone laying, they took the Bible out of the old cornerstone, which the fire had not even reached and placed it in the box in the new cornerstone as a fitting foundation for an institution that ministered to the mental, moral and spiritual needs of the young women of the country. The Bible, which is the law and Gospel of Christ, is the foundation of the highest manhood and womanhood. "And are built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief cornerstone." (Eph. 2: 20.)

Good Wanderer's Genuine Heroism

SEVERAL persons leaped from windows or were lowered unconscious down the escapes during a fire in an apartment house in Chicago the other night. A ragged tramp discovered the fire, raised an alarm and then went into the building and again and carried out at least a score of unconscious from the smoke, who without his help would have perished. When asked his name simply said, "I am just a plain wanderer," and slipped away unidentified into the crowd. What a hero he was! In his spirit he was like unto the Son of Man who said: "For the Son of man is come to seek and to save that which was lost." (Matt. 18: 14.)

Extracting Bullets by Magnets

WORKSHOPS and factories, when pieces of work have been embedded in the flesh of workers, they have often been extracted by a powerful electro-magnet. In 1910 a French physician invented a huge electrometer, which is in use in the Dogenettes Hospital. It has no effect on the French and German shrapnel, made of lead, nor the French bullet covered with German silver, but the fragments of cast-iron shells and the German balls covered with ferronickel easily responded to this powerful magnet, which will reach some balls four and a half inches below the surface, and lighter pieces of shell embedded five and eight-tenths inches deep. Terrible as is the loss of life in the European war, the progress of modern surgery in the past fifty years lessens greatly the mortality of the wounded. There are moral and spiritual wounds and the magnet of love will extract the sins that lie embedded in the heart. The prophet says: "For I will restore health unto thee, and I will heal thee of thy wounds, saith the Lord." (Jer. 30: 17.)

PARENTS ABANDON LITTLE BOYS

CROWDS of women shoppers on Broadway, New York, the other afternoon gathered about two little boys who were alone on the sidewalk. They were children of five and three years, and the elder was crying while the younger sat unconcernedly in his go-cart. No one claiming them, they were taken to the police precinct station, where a sealed letter, which had been found pinned to the coat of the elder boy, was opened and read. This was the note: "Persons who are kind enough to take care of these boys for two months, until I find employment, will be appreciated if they would print their whereabouts, as I wish to have them back when I can keep same. At the present time, I am down to my last cent, and as work here is at a standstill, I must go elsewhere. Therefore, my babies must have a place while I am on the hunt. Although it is painful for me to do this, there is no other way out of it. God knows it is better to put them some place where they can get food and rest, instead of doing a crime. Trusting some one will print in the paper their whereabouts." Signed, "Father and Mother." The handwriting seemed to be disguised. The police authorities gave the boys over to the care of the Children's Society. A detective found the parents in a furnished house in New York. They admitted that they had deserted the two younger children, one a little baby only two months old, in the same manner. One was sent to the New York Foundling Hospital, the other to the New York Nursery Hospital. There was poverty from the hard times, but there was the greater poverty of the parental instinct which should have prized the babies above all the money in the banks, and prevented the dishonest method of abandoning them. The desertion of children by parents is here used as a contrast to express the divine love: "When my father and my mother forsake me, then the Lord will take me up." (Ps. 27: 10.)

Scientist Claims That Plants Feel

MR. J. B. BOSE, a native of India, is professor of physics in the Presidency College of Calcutta, and one of the closest students of the secrets of plant life in the world. He has been making a tour of Europe, giving demonstrations to prove that plants feel—that they are susceptible to pain and to exhilaration. His instruments and experiments have surprised the world of science. He is at present in this country and recently gave a demonstration of his discoveries before Secretary Bryan, a personal friend, and a group of state officials. To demonstrate the emotions of a plant he pinched one of the growing things that he had brought with him, and immediately a fine needle, attached to a lever connected with the plant, became agitated, and exhibited its emotion by making dots on the smoked side of a glass plate. Dr. Bose put one plant to death by giving it a dose of cyanide of potassium, and stimulated another with alcohol. Every new discovery of the mysteries of plant life takes us back to the Author of all life, vegetable and animal, and to these words: "And the Lord God made the earth and the heavens, and every plant of the field before it was in the earth, and every herb of the field before it grew." (Gen. 2: 4, 5.)

Prosperity of American Farmers

THE Department of Agriculture at Washington, after having investigated the income of farmers, says: "The average farmer receives little more money for his year's work than he would be paid if he had hired out as a farm hand." The department does not take account of the fact that the farmer gets most of his living thrown in. He raises much that he uses that cost people in other callings a large amount. The automobile men, who are good judges of solvency, say the farmers are the most prosperous class in the country. They say that of the 1,500,000 automobiles in the United States, costing $1,500,000,000, one half of them are owned by the farmers. Men and women on the farm have to work hard, but physical, educational and social advantages have so improved that their life is healthy, happy, useful and prosperous. Christ made frequent references to agriculture as an industry. Here is one of them: "But they made light of it, and went their ways, one to his farm, another to his merchandise." (Matt. 22: 5.)

"If Your Heart Keeps Right"

"IF YOUR Heart Keeps Right" is the name of one of the most popular hymns sung at Billy Sunday's meetings. The other Sunday night there were 20,000 people in the tabernacle in Philadelphia and the choir master, Homer A. Rodeheaver, called for hymn No. 16. He said in a loud voice, "I want this hymn sung with particular expression tonight for two reasons. First, it is a young people's hymn, full of promise and enthusiasm, and it ought to be sung with feeling by this crowd of students. Second, the woman who wrote the verses is on the platform, Mrs. Lizzie De Armond, and she will hear her production for the first time in public." The author blushed like a girl and tears filled her eyes as the 20,000 voices took up the mighty volume of praise. B. D. Ackley, Sunday's pianist, set the words to music, which is familiar in the homes and on the streets of Philadelphia. It is said that the author received $1.75 for it originally, and she claimed at the time that that was about all it was really worth. At the close of the meeting Mrs. De Armond told how she happened to write the hymn. She said, "One day I thought how great a part in our life our heart plays. It is the center of all our spiritual life. If our hearts are right everything in us will be all right. This thought of how good hearts make good deeds inspired me to write it." She put into melody this thought of God in the Scriptures: "Keep thy heart with all diligence; for out of it are the issues of life." (Prov. 4: 23.)

Mohammedanism and the War

NOT only Palestine but the Farther East is reported as likely to become involved in military operations soon. An armed force is now reported as being in the valley of the Euphrates moving north, while another force is moving southwards. Bagdad, Damascus, the province of Syria and possibly even Mecca and Medina may be scenes of military activities in the near future. It is not considered probable, however, that the forces of Christian powers will be used against the sacred cities of Mohammedanism, although an effort may be made by the Yemen Arabs to capture the cities of the prophet. There are between 200,000,000 and 300,000,000 Mohammedans on the globe, a great majority of whom have not responded to the call for a jihad or "holy war." Students of prophecy are especially interested in the developments now taking place. They see in them a foreshadowing of the breakup of Turkey, so long predicted and so often averted by European intervention and will turn to God's universal rule toward which events are moving, thus spoken by the prophet: "Thou art the God, even thou alone, of all the kingdoms of the earth." (Isa. 37: 16.)

"FOR SOME MUST WEEP"

FOR some must weep while others play; so runs this busy world away." This couplet may not be accurately quoted, but it is often used somewhat in this form as an easy philosophy to lessen our sense of personal responsibility in the misfortune of others. The first terrible this help has not been a spasmodic outburst of generosity on the impulse of the moment, but is continuous, undiminished, unregretted. And as the winter wears on, the great good being done by the specific work of the Christian Herald Fund among the widows and orphans of the war will shock of the war is past, just as in Italy the first horror of the earthquake is past. The acuteness of the misery into which the war and the earthquake plunged countless families is undiminished in their breasts, though all the world resumes its play.

And so they weep on in Belgium and in East Prussia, in Poland and Serbia, and in Northern France. Hunger and cold are still most terribly real to women and children made destitute by war, helpless in the face of their great calamity.

When this chapter of history shall have been completed, its great redeeming feature will be the wonderful outpouring of help from America. And the greatness of this wonder is that become increasingly apparent. We rejoice with you that you have been able to give so well to this deserving cause. We hope that prosperous times throughout our land will enable Christian Herald readers to keep up this splendid bounty as long as the poignant need exists. Your gifts are being administered with the utmost carefulness and we shall in due time be able to tell you very definitely of the good accomplished through the agency of this fund. In the meantime, keep this work warm in your thoughts and prayers.

Please address all communications and remittances to the Widows and Orphans Fund, Christian Herald, Bible House, New York.

INVESTIGATING CAPITAL'S ATTITUDE TOWARD LABOR. The United States Commission on Industrial Relations is investigating such endowed philanthropic corporations as the Sage Foundation and the Rockefeller Foundation with a view to determining what influence, if any, is exercised through such organizations upon industrial conditions. The commission began its work in New York about the middle of January, and elicited much important testimony. On January 9 Samuel Untermyer stated, among other things, that a capitalistic system is our only present solution of industrial questions. He said in part: "Notwithstanding its injustice and many other shortcomings, I believe in the capitalistic system, as our only present solution. Capitalism is more powerful, more rampant, more despotic and less controlled by law or public sentiment here than in any other country, but Socialism is a beautiful iridescent dream, which does not work out a practical theory of government. Of all the founders of capitalism, the worst is its disregard of the welfare of its industrial workers." Mr. Untermyer declared the manner of the organization of the Rockefeller, Carnegie and Sage Foundations to be "a fair illustration of the ethics of our system," and went on to show how charters for those corporations were obtained from New York state because it was not possible to obtain federal incorporation from Congress satisfactory to the founders. In other words, there is such a lack of uniformity in our corporation laws that a new organization may go from state to state till, in all probability, it obtains a charter on its own terms, whereas a uniform federal law would correct that condition of things, in Mr. Untermyer's opinion. The eminent lawyer, however, expressed himself as entirely satisfied with the purpose and management of the foundations under investigation. He also stated that under our present system "a handful of men in New York has a potential control over the relations between railroads (the specified eight companies) and the employees, and can dictate a practical uniform policy toward labor, whenever the occasion requires. It is a vastly more powerful organization than the organization of labor." He also expressed the opinion that the Reserve-banking law would do much to check the undue centralization of wealth. Mr. Roger W. Babson, as a witness, gave the opinion that of the total of American industries 80 per cent. is in the hands of absentee landlordism. He likened the relations of capital and labor today to those of England and the American colonies before the American revolution. England, he said, "learned its lesson, so capital must learn hers." Mr. Ida Tarbell advocated scientific management of business, as declared that the Golden Rule, if applied to industry, would solve all its problems, and expressed the belief that a silent revolution is taking place in American industry that would eventually work out a policy of doing as you would be done by, in business. John H. Schiff, head of the banking house of Kuhn, Loeb & Co., denied Mr. Untermyer's statement as to the centralization of control over a large number of railroads. He and August Belmont, chairman of the Interborough Rapid Transit Company, both stated that the wages and hours of employees are matters for executives and not directors of corporations. He expressed himself in favor of federal effort to find employment for men and declared that any organization which would be a benefit to the moral and economic condition of the employees would be a good thing for the state, an opinion in which Mr. Belmont did not fully concur. The inquiry is attracting nation-wide attention. At this writing it is too early to comment upon this specific work of the commission, as the testimony is still in a preliminary way, and is not yet in form for analysis.

MEXICO. The convention of military chiefs which purports to rule Mexico, on January 15 deposed its first provisional president appointee, Gutierrez, and placed General Huey Gonzalez Garza in the chair, pending a regular election. General Gutierrez at once joined forces with General O'Gorman with the intention of seizing the reins of government. Thus Mexico is torn by three contending factions, led respectively by Carranza, whose capital is at Vera Cruz; Gutierrez, whose capital is in the field, and Garza at Mexico City. Villa and his followers may be considered as a fourth faction, though practically ready to assimilate any of the others who will operate against Carranza. He has, however, virtually admitted his inability to dominate Mexico, and is reported to be considering the setting up of an independent republic composed of the northern states of Mexico. Besides the four belligerent factions there are now a number of minor revolutionary movements in different states.

ATTACK COMPENSATION LAW. There is a determined movement to amend the New York Workmen's Compensation Law, as, in the opinion of labor leaders, it operates against certain classes. The New York law is to some extent looked upon as a model, but criticism is made that in trades where a man may make $5 to $6 a day ordinarily, he cannot obtain more than $15 a week in compensation when incapacitated by injury, whereas formerly by litigation heavier damages were obtainable. Employers, it is alleged, in view of the comparatively small compulsory indemnity no longer take the same precautions as formerly to insure the safety of employees. Slowness in making awards is complained of and also other features which labor leaders consider undesirable. A bill is in preparation to be introduced in Albany substituting for the present compensation act a new one based upon the plan in use in Germany whereby the state issues stamps through employers to be pasted by the employee in a record book which is to be submitted in connection with any claim for damages, the state making the award, payable from a specific tax upon employers for the purpose. This is not considered popular with American workmen.

IDAHO BARS ALIEN LANDLORDISM. The Idaho House of Representatives on January 20 passed a bill somewhat similar to the California act which has created so much feeling in Japan, prohibiting the acquisition of land in Idaho by alien persons, firms or associations except by inheritance or the enforcement of liens, and land so acquired must be disposed of within five years or forfeited to the state. No mention of nationality is made. The press of Japan has been quoted as calling on the PRODIGAL AMERICA. In a special report the Department of Commerce gives the total export figures for the month of December as 28,875,217 bushels of wheat, five times that of December, 1913, and at $1.25 a bushel as against 96 cents a year ago; flour exports, 68 1/2 per cent. more than a year ago; oats,

A JOY-BOMB AT THE WHITE HOUSE. An aerial flier, called the Stork, dropped a seven-and-a-half-pound joy-bomb right in the White House on the afternoon of January 17, and immediately everybody was seized with a violent attack of happiness. The President radiated smiles for hours. His daughter, Mrs. Francis Bowes Sayre, who is visiting her distinguished father, promptly took the object, which was emitting strange noises, into her arms so as bravely to receive into her own bosom most of the happiness the joy-bomb could discharge. Mr. Sayre, who had been summoned by telegraph, reached the scene an hour or so after the arrival, and heroically determined to share his smiling wife's responsibility for the future safe-keeping of the welcome intruder, and for the sake of general convenience they named it Francis Sayre—Over eighty years ago a grandson to President Jackson was born in the White House; Francis Sayre is the first boy born there since. In all six girls and five boys have sent up their first democratic protests against restraint in the home of our Presidents.

A MILLION FOR STEVENS INSTITUTE. In an enthusiastic campaign the alumni and friends of Stevens Institute of Technology, Hoboken, N. J., are in sight of the $1,360,000 they set out to raise for an engineering college to be erected in connection with the institute. The subscriptions came in from all over the country.

THE "DACIA" INCIDENT. Important international developments may grow out of the transfer of the former Hamburg-American ship Dacia to American ownership under the emergency rules devised by Congress to facilitate export shipping during the war. The ship was loaded at Galveston with cotton and consigned to a German port. The British Government made known its inability to accept the transfer as legitimate under the rules of war, and the consequent certainty of the seizure of the ship on the high seas as a prize of war pending investigation by Great Britain of the transfer led our government to request England to waive the point on the ship's initial trip in order to prevent complications, the request being declined on the ground that England could not risk establishing a precedent which might be taken advantage of by unscrupulous governments, who could connive at a pretense of transfer of ownership of vessels in order that such vessels might, under the guise of neutrality, serve their country, and the British Government informed our State Department that if the Dacia sailed for Germany she would be seized and taken to a British port to have the character of her transfer passed upon by a British prize court. It is said that the British people are much exercised over the incident, which, however, presents at present only the character of a test case in the controversy which has arisen between the two countries over Great Britain's attitude toward American shipping. It is stated that British warships are cruising between Key West and Havana in order to seize the Dacia, which was booked to sail in the latter part of January. The question of treatment of the American flag on vessels seized as prizes of war has also arisen because of the alleged hauling down of our flag on the steamer Grienbrier by a British officer when the vessel was seized on her way to Bremen with a cargo of cotton. This vessel was later released and the incident is receiving official investigation.

WHAT WERE THE SEISMOGRAPHS DOING? According to a news despatch of January 21 from Madrid, an earthquake on January 2 greatly damaged some eighteen villages in the northern section of Spain, but owing to lack of communication the news has just been received at the capital.

THE LITERACY TEST. So great has grown the opposition to the immigration bill now in the President's hands that a public hearing was arranged to take place at the White House on January 22 at which opponents and advocates would present their views. Tammany Hall sent a special delegation of its most prominent members to protest against the bill. On January 21 the lower house of the Rhode Island legislature passed a resolution calling upon the President to veto the bill. A petition to the President to veto the bill was also signed by representative New York Jews.

FOR AN INTERNATIONAL COURT. Representative Bartholdt has introduced in the House a joint resolution proposing an international court to meet at The Hague to adjust all disputes among nations, its decrees to be enforced by an international army and navy, individual national ownership of battle-ships to be abolished; the President of the United States is called upon in the measure to initiate the movement.

PASSING OF GOVERNOR BLEASE. Five days before the expiration of his four-year term as governor of South Carolina, Cole L. Blease resigned the office in the face of threatened impeachment proceedings growing out of this extensive pardoning of state prisoners, more than 3,000 having been freed by him. Governor Blease also issued an order disbanding the militia just prior to his resignation, because of conflict of opinion with federal authorities. It is not understood that the threatened impeachment was taken seriously by the ex-governor.

TO HER sister Mrs. Carew wrote distractedly of the whole affair, closing with:

"What I'm going to do I don't know; but I suppose I shall have to keep right on doing as I am doing. There is no other way. Of course, if Pollyanna once begins to preach—but she hasn't yet; so I can't, with a clear conscience, send her back to you."

Della, reading this letter at the Sanatorium, laughed at the conclusion.

"Hasn't preached yet," indeed!" she chuckled to herself. "Bless her dear heart! And yet you, Ruth Carew, own up to giving two Christmas-tree parties within a week, and, as I happen to know, your home, which used to be shrouded in death-like gloom, is aflame with scarlet and green from top to toe. But she hasn't preached yet—oh, no, she hasn't preached yet!"

The party was a great success. Even Mrs. Carew admitted that. Jamie, in his wheel chair, Jerry with his startling but expressive vocabulary, and the girl (whose name proved to be Sadie Dean), vied with each other in amusing the more diffident guests. Sadie Dean, much to the others' surprise—and perhaps to her own—disclosed an intimate knowledge of the most fascinating games; and these games, with Jamie's stories and Jerry's good-natured banter, kept every one in gales of laughter until supper and the generous distribution of presents from the laden tree sent the happy guests home with tired sighs of content.

If Jamie (who with Jerry was the last to leave) looked about him a bit wistfully, no one apparently noticed it. Yet Mrs. Carew, when she bade him good-night, said low in his ear, half impatiently, half embarrassedly:

"Well, Jamie, have you changed your mind—about coming?"

The boy hesitated. A faint color stole into his cheeks. He turned and looked into her eyes wistfully, searchingly. Then he shook his head.

"If it could always be—like tonight, I—could," he sighed. "But it couldn't. There'd be tomorrow, and next week, and next month, and next year comin'; and I'd know before next week that I hadn't oughter come."

If Mrs. Carew had thought that the New Year's Eve party was to end the matter of Pollyanna's efforts in behalf of Sadie Dean, she was soon undeceived; for the very next morning Pollyanna began to talk of her.

"And I'm so glad I found her again," she prattled contentedly. "Even if I haven't been able to find the real Jamie for you, I've found somebody else for you to love—and of course you'll love to love her, 'cause it's just another way of loving Jamie."

Mrs. Carew drew in her breath and gave a little gasp of exasperation. This unflinching faith in her goodness of heart, and unhesitating belief in her desire to "help everybody" was most disconcerting, and sometimes most annoying. At the same time it was a most difficult thing to disclaim—under the circumstances, especially with Pollyanna's happy, confident eyes full on her face.

"But, Pollyanna," she objected impotently, at last, feeling very much as if she were struggling against invisible silken cords, "I—you—this girl really isn't Jamie, at all, you know."

"I know she isn't," sympathized Pollyanna quickly. "And of course I'm just as sorry she isn't Jamie as can be. But she's somebody's Jamie—that is, I mean, she hasn't got anybody down here to love her and—notice, you know; and so whenever you remember Jamie I should think you couldn't be glad enough there was somebody you could help, just as you'd want folks to help Jamie, wherever he is."

Mrs. Carew shivered and gave a little moan.

"But I want my Jamie," she grieved. Pollyanna nodded with understanding eyes.

"I know—the 'child's presence.' Mr. Pendleton told me about it—only you've got the 'woman's hand.'"

"Woman's hand?"

"Yes—to make a home, you know. He said that it took a woman's hand or a child's presence to make a home. That was when he wanted me, and I found him Jimmy, and he adopted him instead."

"Jimmy?" Mrs. Carew looked up with the startled something in her eyes that always came into them at the mention of any variant of that name.

"Yes; Jimmy Bean."

"Oh—Bean," said Mrs. Carew, relaxing.

"Yes. He was from an Orphan's Home, and he ran away. I found him. He said he wanted another kind of a home with a mother in it instead of a Matron. I couldn't find him the mother part, but I found him Mr. Pendleton, and he adopted him. His name is Jimmy Pendleton now."

"But it was—Bean?"

"Yes, it was Bean."

"Oh!" said Mrs. Carew, this time with a long sigh.

MRS. CAREW saw much of Sadie Dean during the days following the New Year's Eve party. She saw a good deal of Jamie too. In one way and another Pollyanna contrived to have them frequently at the house; and this Mrs. Carew, much to her surprise and vexation, could not seem to prevent. Her consent and even her delight were taken by Pollyanna as so much a matter of course that she found herself helpless to convince the child that neither approval nor satisfaction entered into the matter at all, as far as she was concerned.

But Mrs. Carew, whether she herself realized it or not, was learning many things—things she never could have learned in the old days, shut up in her rooms, with orders to Mary to admit no one. She was learning something of what it means to be a lonely young girl in a big city, with one's living to earn, and no one to care—except one who cares too much, and too little.

"But what did you mean?" she nervously asked Sadie Dean one evening, "what did you mean that first day in the store—what you said—about helping the girls?"

Sadie Dean colored distressfully. "I'm afraid I was rude," she apologized.

"Never mind that. Tell me what you meant. I've thought of it so many times since."

For a moment the girl was silent; then, a little bitterly, she said:

"'Twas because I knew a girl once, and I was thinkin' of her. She came from my town, and she was pretty and good, but she wan't over strong. For three years we pulled together, sharin' the same room, boiling our eggs over the same gas-jet, and eatin' our hash and fishballs for supper at the same cheap restaurant. There was never anything to do evenin's but to walk in the Common, or go to the movies, if we had the dime, or just stay in our room. Well, our room wasn't very pleasant. It was hot in summer, and cold in winter, and the gas-jet was so flickery that we couldn't sew or read, even if we hadn't been too fagged out to do either—which we 'most generally was. Besides, over our heads was a squeaky board that some one was always rockin' on, and under us was a man that was learnin' to play the cornet. Did you ever hear any one learn to play the cornet?"

"N-no, I don't think so," murmured Mrs. Carew.

"Well, you've missed a lot," said the girl dryly. Then, after a moment, she resumed her story.

"Sometimes, 'specially at Christmas and holidays, we used to walk up here on the Avenue and other streets, huntin' for windows where the curtains were up, and we could look in. You see, we were pretty lonesome, them days 'specially, and we said it did us good to see the homes with folks, and lamps on the center-tables, and children playin' games; but we both of us knew that really it only made us feel worse than ever, because we were so hopelessly out of it all. 'Twas even harder to see the automobiles, and the gay young folks in them, laughing and chatting. We wanted a good time, too; and, by and by—my chum began to have it—this good time."

"Well, to make a long story short, we broke partnership one day, and she went her way, and I mine. I didn't like the company she was keepin', and I said so. She wouldn't give 'em up, so we quit. I didn't see her again for three years, then I got a note from her, and I went. She was in one of those rescue homes. It was a lovely place; soft rugs, fine pictures, plants, flowers, and books, a piano, a beautiful room, and everything possible done for her. Rich women came in their carriages and automobiles to take her driving, and she was taken to concerts and matinees. She was learnin' stenography, and they were going to help get her a position just as soon as she could take it. Everybody was wonderfully good to her, she said, and showed they wanted to help her in every way. But she said something else, too. She said:

"'Sadie, if they'd taken one-half the pains to show me they cared and wanted to help long ago when I was an honest, self-respectin', hard-workin', homesick girl—I wouldn't have been here for them to help now.' And—well, I never forgot it. That's all. It ain't that I'm objectin' to the rescue work—it's a fine thing, and they ought to do it. Only I'm thinkin' there wouldn't be quite so much of it for them to do—if they'd just show a little of their interest earlier in the game."

"But I thought—there were working girls' homes, and—and settlement houses that—that did that sort of thing," faltered Mrs. Carew.

"There are. Did you ever see the inside of one of them?"

"Why, n-no; though I—I have given money to them." This time Mrs. Carew's voice was almost apologetically pleading in tone.

Sadie Dean smiled curiously.

"Yes, I know. There are lots of good women that have given money to them—and have never seen the inside of one of them. Please don't understand that I'm sayin' anythin' against the homes. I'm not. They're good things. They're almost the only thing that's doing anything to help; but they're only a drop in the bucket to what is really needed. I tried one once; but there was an air about it—somehow I felt— But, there, what's the use? Probably they aren't all like that one, and maybe the fault was with me. If I should try to tell you, you wouldn't understand. You'd have to live in it—and you haven't even seen the inside of one. But I can't help wonderin' sometimes why so many of those good women never seem to put the real heart and interest into the preventin' that they do in the rescuin'. But there! I didn't mean to talk such a lot. But—you asked me."

"Yes, I asked you," said Mrs. Carew in a half-stifled voice.

Not only from Sadie Dean, however, was Mrs. Carew learning things never learned before, but from Jamie, also.

Jamie was there a great deal. Pollyanna liked to have him there, and he sho' am great"

Thus opines old mammy as she beams over the big, hot meat pie she has prepared for "company" dinner.

At first she had been doubtful of this "newfangled" cooking fat. But she tried it out—gave it a thorough test under all the practical difficulties of actual kitchen use.

And finally, as the supreme evidence of her faith in its good qualities, she has used it in the meat pie on which her fame as a cook chiefly rests.

CRISCO
For Frying—For Shortening
For Cake Making

Mammy's is only one experience out of thousands of the same sort. The best cooks appreciate Crisco most. For purity, digestibility, economy and convenience in keeping and handling, they have found it unsurpassed.

That is why the Crisco can is a familiar sight in the kitchens of first-class cooks everywhere.

Plain Crisco Pastry

1½ cups flour 1 teaspoonful salt
½ cup Crisco cold water
(Use level measurements)

Sift flour and salt and cut Crisco into flour with knife until finely divided. Finger tips may be used to finish blending materials. Add gradually sufficient water to make stiff paste. Water should be added sparingly and mixed with knife through dry ingredients. Form lightly and quickly with hand into dough; roll out on slightly floured board, about one-quarter inch thick. Use light motion in handling rolling-pin, and roll from center outward. Sufficient for one small pie.

If you would care to know more about Crisco, write for a copy of the "Calendar of Dinners", addressing your request to Department S-2, The Procter & Gamble Company, Cincinnati, Ohio, and including five 2-cent stamps. You will receive a book of 615 new cooking recipes and a complete account of what Crisco is, how and where it is made, and what it will do to simplify and improve your cooking.

THE CALL OF SAMUEL

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR FEBRUARY 14.
1 Sam. 1: 24-28; 3: 1-21

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By Rev. F. B. Meyer, D.D.

"Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth." 1 Sam. 3: 9

In the beginning of Christian life we listen as servants. "What saith my Lord unto his servant?" Is it "Go," or "Come," or "Do this"? All other voices are hushed, that we may not miss one accent of his. Thus we are tested. "He that hath my commandments and keepeth them, he it is that loveth me." But after a time, the Lord says: "Henceforth I call you not a servant, but a friend." Then there is perceptible change in his voice, and he loves to hear us whisper back in response: "Speak, Lord, for thy friend [though unworthy to call thee so] heareth." Thenceforth he tells us plainly of the Father, unfolds to us things to come, and manifests himself as not unto the world. Did he not speak more freely in the upper room when Judas had left it? There is the speech of outward providence, of the words of Scripture and of the inner voice of the Spirit in the heart. Sometimes his fellowship and communion are too deep for words. Unspeakable! And even if he has to correct us, and the words are bitter to listen to, they will be wholesome for the inner digestion, and become the joy and rejoicing of the heart.

Hearing His Voice

By Arthur H. Howland

THE voices of our friends! How we love to hear them; how we love to remember them when we are absent from home; how we long for them in the dark days when we long for the touch of a vanished hand, and the sound of a voice that is still!

the voice of God—can we hear that? Can it be more than a dream, a memory, or the reading of words out of a book? Will he really talk to us? Yes, he will, or all our religion is a delusion.

And you read Frances Hodgson Burnett's story, The Dawn of a Tomorrow? If not you missed not only a rare pleasure, but an inspiration and consolation as well. "Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth." These were the simple words with which "Glad" transformed the lives of those who shared with her the sordid atmosphere of a London slum and with which she led the despairing rich man to a new hope and a new life.

Mr. James Denney, writing for a recent number of the British Weekly a review of Dr. Macgregor's book on Christian Freedom, states and sanctifies the latter's claim that "religion depends on immediate, vital communion between God and man, and that where such communion exists nothing can be pleaded against it. Where it is ceased to exist, or where any institutional authority is maintained in opposition to it, religion is decadent or dead."

When the boy Samuel heard God's voice in the temple, the word of the Lord was "rare." The translation "precious" hardly gives the right idea. The word of God is always precious, this is, of great value; but in this instance the word goes back to the root-meaning of precious—it was precious because it was so rare. Not many people were listening to God in those days. Right in the "house of God" there was the wickedness, as Eli's sons defied God's laws and made their sacred duties the occasion for sin. But because Samuel's heart was pure and his mind sensitive to divine influences God talked to him, gave him a message to the old priest himself.

There is need, too, in these days for people who can and will hear his voice. He wants to send a message to your community, could he do it through you? Each one of us may be channels for taking God's message to others.

A prophet means not only one who foretells events, but one who gets messages of any sort from God. In the New Testament this was recognized as a fundamental part of the Christian life. The early Christian prayer meetings were like our modern ones and the members came together to report the messages God had given them. Did you ever have the experience in a devotional meeting of being impelled to announce or to start a certain hymn? You hesitated, and some one else almost immediately announced the same hymn. This may perhaps be partly explained by natural laws of mind, but the bulk of these explanations is the deeper fact that God's Spirit worked to get the message of the hymn to the meeting and tried first one, then another, to find a spirit and a tongue ready, alert, willing.

The question how to detect God's voice from misleading impressions is too long for discussion here, but will make a good subject for class discussion.

Also talk about this "house of God" in which Samuel dwelt. It should not be called the Temple, because the temple was not yet built. It was the old tabernacle of the wilderness, set up doubtless with a number of adjacent, more permanent structures, all devoted, at least in name, to the service of Jehovah.

Samuel's Conversion

By Rev. Edwin Whittier Caswell

SAMUEL means "asked of God." He came into life in answer to the prayers of a devoted mother, was consecrated in childhood to the service of God, and brought up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. Home is the head of the river of human life. As the fountain, so will be the stream. Out of the home flows national, social and religious character.

All nations, all churches, all organizations are but an aggregation of homes. In this earthly Eden, the parents are priests; the children are the congregation in the church in the house. Jesus, reared and instructed in such a godly home, at the age of twelve years confounded the doctors in the temple. Timothy, Paul's noblest helper, had the faith that was in his grandmother, Lois, and his mother, Eunice, and from a child knew the Holy Scriptures. Body, mind and soul are in the molding hands of parents. What immortal stewardship is theirs!

God said of Abraham: "For I know him that he will command his children and his household after him." Evidently, in Eli's home, golden opportunities were not improved. His children lacked the early government and counsel. "For he restrained them not."

Hannah was true to her promise. After Samuel was old enough, he graduated to the temple services, where he became a doorkeeper in the house of the Lord and ministered unto Eli. We should remember what a struggle his young heart must have endured, resisting the corrupting influences of Eli's sons. His early nurture and teaching is now put into practice. Training is useless if one never meets with trial, struggle or action. We use or lose.

"But Samuel did not yet know the Lord." He had not held personal, conscious communion with him, so as to know his voice, his leading and love. His previous service had been formal, dutiful and obedient, doing the will of God, that he might afterward know by heart experiences the indwelling of the divine Spirit.

One night, when a voice called "Samuel," thinking it was Eli he answered, "Here am I!" But no priest can help us to understand God's voice; no oracle is his interpreter; no human

The Club-Style Mid-Day Dish

Clubs, hotels, cafes and lunch rooms—thousands of them—now buy Van Camp's for men.

They used to bake their own Beans, as countless homes do still. But they cater to men in large part. And men who once taste Van Camp's Beans demand them.

Now countless men call Van Camp's the "Club-Style Pork and Beans." Or they call them the "Downtown Style." That means to them Beans mealy and whole—Beans with a tang and zest—Beans that easily digest.

Isn't that a suggestion to you, Mrs. Housewife? You want men to find things at home as delicious as they find them served downtown.

VAN CAMP'S

PORK & BEANS

BAKED WITH TOMATO SAUCE

Also Baked Without the Sauce

10, 15 and 20 Cents Per Can

To bake such a dish in your home is impossible. You would need a steam oven, for one thing. Else some beans will be crisped, some broken, some mushy, and none will be more than half-baked.

You would need able chefs, such as we have. You would need our matchless sauce. And the sparkling sauce must be baked with the beans to give zest to every atom.

You can't do that. Nor can you buy beans baked elsewhere that are like Van Camp's. This is our specialty. We have spent 20 years on it. The dish we produce is inimitable.

It is easy to prove this—one serving will do it. Then you will know a ready-cooked meal which everyone will welcome. Don't wait to try it, and don't forget. Tell your grocer to send a few cans.

If you do not find Van Camp's the best beans you ever ate, your grocer will refund your money.

"Look for the Name in the Selvage"

This is the proof of the genuine Skinner's Satin

Every inch of Skinner's Satin has the name woven in the selvage. If the name is not there, the satin is not Skinner's.

Worthless Imitations

There are many worthless satins now on the market, weighted with chemicals to give them a high lustre and deceive the purchaser. The manufacturers of some of these goods are imitating the selvage of Skinner's Satin.

The Skinner Guarantee

Be on your guard and find the words Skinner's Satin in the selvage, then you will know you have the genuine.

Skinner's Satin is guaranteed to wear two seasons. If it does not, send the garment to any of our stores and we will reline it free of expense.

person his mediator. "My sheep hear my voice; they know not the voice of strangers." In hours of great exigency, in crises of the soul's eternal destiny, God alone can convey his message "and no man knoweth it save he who receiveth it." Absolute certainty that God is speaking to us is essential to peace and power.

The little boy Samuel now stood face to face with his God as he said, "Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth." After that holy interview, Samuel grew in grace and the Lord was with him. Is not soul salvation the greatest mission of Christ to men, of the church to the world and of the Sunday school to its learners? These lambs of the flock must be brought into the fold of the Master. Should not our mottoes be "My son, give me thine heart," "And they brought him to Jesus"? Here begin all the great reformatory movements, civilizing powers and the Christianization of mankind.

God calls us today by his voice in his holy Word, by his providences, his sent messengers in Sunday school, his ministers in pulpits, by parents in the home, by his still, small voice, uttered by the Holy Spirit to the consciences of men, by angel ministry—all these cry, "Behold the Lamb of God, who taketh away the sins of the world."

Samuel, the high priest and judge, established the monarchy in place of the theocracy; he crowned kings, ruled and guided his people with integrity, righteousness and wisdom. He was true to Eli, telling him everything God had proclaimed to him on that wonderful night. It was an awful message to give to an over-indulgent father, but the young man did not shun to declare the whole counsel of God. Are not some tempted today to smooth over unpalatable truths, as a surgeon is to hide the fact of a deadly disease? Ministers are not commissioned with plenipotentiary powers to mankind. They are to preach the glorious Gospel of Christ as he has delivered it, and if men reject that Gospel, God's inexorable laws will visit them with certain penalties.

After Saul became king, Samuel retired from his high office into apparent obscurity. Only a man of a pure and noble character can surrender his place and power with a kindly feeling. In Samuel's leisure, he inaugurated the school of the prophets, and there culminated the grandest work of his career. To Samuel we owe David, Elijah, Elisha, Isaiah, Daniel and all the prophets. All institutions of theological learning date back to the college he established on Mount Ephraim. Samuel was the last of the judges and the first of the prophets, for Moses was more a lawgiver than a prophet.

Echoes from the Holy Land

By Rev. Franklin E. Hoskins, D.D.

Member of Syria Mission

SHILOH is one of the few places in Scripture so accurately described that there can never be any doubt as to the exact locality. The name is translated "the place of tranquillity," and the most natural feature in the situation of Seilun (the modern name) is its seclusion. Near to the main roads of antiquity and yet not exactly on any of them—"on the east side of the highway that goeth up from Bethel to Shechem"—it was an ideal spot for retirement and worship. Travelers of today must turn aside from the modern carriage road if they would visit this ancient shrine. It was the spot to which Joshua moved his headquarters from Gilgal in the plain of the Jordan and was the second encampment west of that river. The whole family of Israel made Shiloh the principal sanctuary during the Judges and it remained so for several hundred years. Feasts and pilgrimages centered there and to its quiet nook came pious Israelites yearly to "worship and to sacrifice." Here came Hannah the mother of Samuel in "bitterness of soul" and "vowed a vow," and here she came again to lend her child to the Lord. This picture of little Samuel at prayer, waiting to hear the voice a second and a third time, is one of the most beautiful scenes of childhood belonging to our race and in all Christian homes one of the most inspiring memories to children. This little boy, given in answer to a mother's prayer, entering into the service of God at Shiloh, "where he ministered to the Lord before Eli the priest," has been in all centuries the pattern of thousands of mothers whose lives are connected so intimately with those of their children.

The "little coat" and the tresses of golden hair are dear to the mother heart of all lands and ages. The name "Samuel" is still one of the favorite names in the land where Samuel lived. I remember how a Syrian mother in Lebanon years ago spoke of her Samuel in a terse Arabic phrase of three words as growing up "kul shibr binither," which means "at every span a fresh vow."

SUNDAY SCHOOL WORKERS' ROUND TABLE

Conducted by Frank L. Brown, Joint General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

THERE are about 40 or 50 in our Sunday school, but I cannot get them to come. Can you give me any suggestions to bring them?—T. B.

A. A prepared program, brevity, brightness and snap in the exercises, a cheery word at the door as scholars come and go, an encouraging word rather than scolding, all help to create interest and a homelike atmosphere without which a school cannot succeed. Little's "Cross and Crown" system has helped attendance in many schools. I should get some method book on the Sunday school such as The Superintendent and His Work, and use the suggestions for promoting platform interest and to make interesting the special days of the Sunday school. Advertise your plans in an article for the local paper. Establish a goal for attendance and membership and get everybody working. If a school has "go" and "glow" to it there will be some "grow" there, too.

Q. I am looking for a good text book of New Testament teachings that is simple yet broad and practical, for the teacher's use for a class of high school girls or young women.

A. In addition to some of the text books mentioned in a previous answer in this issue, I would suggest consideration of The Man Christ Jesus (Speer) for preparatory class, and The Principles of Jesus (Speer). Harry Emerson Fosdick's The Manhood of the Master is strong. Outline Studies of the Life of Christ and Outline Studies of the Apostolic Church by Morgan and Taylor are excellent. The last three books provide for Bible Daily Readings on the subject of the week. The new International Senior Graded Lessons supply some excellent material for those of the age of your class.

Q. How do you open your school and close it?—W. L. R.

A. We open the school or departments with silent prayer after the orchestra introduction. Then we take up a responsive service of Scripture adapted to the lesson as nearly as possible. These exercises are printed on stiff cardboard for our school use. In the back of the best Sunday school song books can be found similar services. Where the graded lessons are used the same plan can be followed if the one graded lesson is taught through the department and the department meets separately for its opening and closing exercises. If several grade lessons are taught in the department or in the school the opening exercises must of course be general in character, but they should consist of Scripture responsive readings and songs that have dignity as well as attractiveness.

Q. Could you suggest ten or twelve profitable topics or methods for our monthly business and social meeting? Class is composed of young men 16 to 22.—W. N. B.

A. Reisner's Social Plans for the Church will suggest some excellent plans for the social part of the evenings. As topics running through the year I may suggest:

February—"Qualities that made Lincoln and Washington great."

March—"Can a man make a million honestly?"

April—"Has the country boy an advantage over the city-trained boy?"

May—"How to save money and how wisely to spend it."

June—"Summer opportunities and perils."

September—"Reading plans for the year."

October—"What does the community rightfully expect of me?"

November—"Has America really advanced or declined since Plymouth Rock?"

December—"What is there in the Christmas thought that the whole world needs?"

January—"The gains and losses of modern social life."

A UNIQUE formula for testing the genuineness of salvation appears in an article by Yoshisaburo Oda, in a little Japanese periodical entitled The Lord's Vineyard in the Sunrise Kingdom, telling of his experiences in preparing to open a mission at Dotonbori, the great theater street in Kobe, Japan. He writes: "We are so thankful to God that we can see our way clear to make an advance and capture one of the enemies' forts and turn it into a place where battle-scarred humanity from the ranks of the army of the devil can come in and find shelter, and a Saviour find the same kind of salvation that I found in an old slum mission, the Pacific Garden Mission, in the city of Chicago—a salvation that will make a man wash the back of his neck, pay his debts, keep the Sabbath Day, love his enemies, gladly give the tenth and more to the Lord and go out and preach a full Gospel to a lost world."

Try My Fireless Cooker 30 Days At My Risk

DON'T you want to make a home test of one of my celebrated Rapid Fireless Cookers? Just try one a month at my risk and prove to me it will save fuel bills—save meat and grocery bills—and save time for you. I will take the cooker back gladly at the end of the test and refund your money if everything about it is not more than satisfactory.

I want you to use it every day—three times a day you wish. My Rapid will cook everything you serve make it more digestible, more delicious. Try it and know for yourself.

I Am Making a Special Factory Price On 10,000 Cooker

Right now to get my Rapid into new neighborhoods quick I am making a specially low inside factory price on 10,000 cookers. But I cannot offer this bargain long for the price of Aluminum has advanced. The Rapid is aluminum lined throughout has full equipment of "Wear-Ever" Aluminum cooking utensils. Try it in your home before I have to raise the price.

Make Money IN CALIFORNIA THIS YEAR

There are many chances for money making today in the great San Joaquin Valley. There, in the heart of golden California, fruit growing, dairying and poultry raising offer returns that appeal to the man who wants to make his effort count for most. One woman's 7-acre ranch returns her net $10,000 a year.

Soil, climate and irrigation make the San Joaquin Valley a great food factory.

It has hungry markets to feed. Two of the big cities of the Pacific Coast hold international expositions this year. Local mines and lumber camps never get enough farm products. And all the rest of the world is glad to get and pay good prices for California products.

You will find a well developed country. There are good schools, good roads, telephones, rural delivery, electricity, light, power and trolleys. You will find a neighborliness and get-together spirit that makes a success of co-operative effort in getting the profit for the grower.

The Santa Fe is not selling land. We want to settle contented, successful farmers along our lines. We know where the opportunities are. We gladly point them out, and put you in touch with men on the ground who will show them to you. We can save you time and money, because you need not duplicate the investigations we have made. Our books, "San Joaquin Valley," "Dairying" and "Poultry Raising" give much information. Then if you will write what more you would like to know, we will be glad to tell you. The books are free, so is all the additional assistance of Santa Fe agricultural demonstrators, who will help new settlers in selecting the right crops to get the best results.

Just give your name and address, and say "Send California books."

Stirred by Revival

NEWS comes of a notable revival at Ludington, Mich. Rev. Arthur P. Bourns, pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Ludington, as secretary of the Ministers' Association, was largely instrumental in uniting the English-speaking churches of the city in an effort to secure an evangelist and hold tabernacle services. The Congregational, Methodist, Presbyterian, Baptist, Swedish-Norwegian and Danish churches joined heartily in the union meetings held for five weeks, during which twelve hundred persons, many of them adults, professed conversion. About 200 converts are expected to unite with the Presbyterian Church; 70 per cent. of these are from the Sabbath school, 20 per cent. from the parish, while 10 per cent. had no previous church relationship. To conserve the results of the revival, the churches are to use some "follow-up methods." Pastoral interviews are held with those who have signified an intention to live the Christian life; communicant classes for the "teen age" converts have been started; and a "Personal Workers' League" of 250 men has been organized. The Ludington revival has brought to the city and county a new conception of Christianity and the church. Present indications point to the closing of the saloons and increasing social service activities for the city.

"Like It All the Way Through"

At this renewal season, I again express my appreciation of the comfort and help that are brought to our home every week in the year through our beloved Christian Herald. We enjoy every page of it. Meditations, Sermons, Bible Lessons, Young People's columns, missionary items, Bible and Newspaper. For reliable news of the terrible war we turn to our old standby. But what is the use of enumerating? We like it all the way through, and assure you that as long as we live, we will remain faithful members of the Christian Herald Family. With the sincere and prayerful wish for God's blessings on the Christian Herald's great work for humanity, etc. H. Z. Oak Park, Ill.

Does Your Figure Please You?

Your dressmaker can never make a gown look well on you unless you have a good figure and unless you carry it well.

I want to make you realize that your figure and health are almost entirely in your own hands, and that by following my simple, hygienic directions in the privacy of your own room that your whole being vibrates health. I have helped 65,000 of the most refined, intellectual women of America to regain health and good figures; and have taught them how to keep well. Why not you? You are busy, but you can devote a few minutes a day, in the privacy of your own room, to following scientific, hygienic principles of health prescribed to your particular needs.

You Can Be So Well

I have reduced the weight of over 32,000 women and increased the weight of as many more. In my work for reduction or building flesh, I strengthen every vital function so that you are full of life and energy.

My work has grown in favor because results are quick, natural and permanent, and because they are scientific and appeal to common sense. Fully one-third of my pupils are sent to me by those who have worked with me.

I wish you could stand with me at my window for a few minutes and, as the women pass, realize with me how many need better figures, better health. They could have them too, with just a little daily effort which is easy—not as hard as what they are enduring.

The best physicians are my friends—their wives and daughters are my pupils. The medical magazines advertise my work. Some one in your town knows me. Ask your friends about my work. I am at my desk daily from 8 to 5.

No Drugs—No Medicines

I study each woman's case just as a physician studies it, the only difference being that instead of medicine I strengthen and put in place weakened organs by exercises for nerves and muscles controlling them, bringing a good circulation of warm blood to them, which I purify by teaching correct breathing. I relieve such ailments as

Indigestion	Catarrh
Constipation	Headaches
Anaemia	Weakness
Sleeplessness	Suffering in
Nervousness	Pregnancy
Torpid Liver	Rheumatism

I have published an interesting booklet showing how to stand and walk correctly and giving other information of vital interest to women. You are welcome to it. Write for it. It is FREE. And I will also tell you about my work. If you are perfectly well and your figure is just what you wish, you may be able to help a dear friend—at least you will help me by your interest in this great movement for greater culture, refinement and beauty in women. Sit down and write me NOW. Don't wait—you may forget it. I have had a wonderful experience and I should like to tell you about it.

Questions and Answers

Mrs. J. F. D. From the time that I was able to reason at all I have held the views of an agnostic, presumably partially due to influence in the home life. Upon reaching maturer years, there seemed to be another influence at work which of late, through church influence and Christian friends, I have almost come to believe is the Spirit of God. In fact for a time I fancied I had conquered agnosticism and even went to the point of accepting Christ, believing that I was thoroughly sincere. Now, since that hour, instead of coming out clearly, I seem to be in a deeper maze than before, and for some reason have a decided antipathy for spiritual things which I have never before felt. Can you explain the trouble?

While your case seems at first to be quite complex, it is in reality very simple. One of the most fundamental facts of human life is that the "natural man" does not feel friendly, or kindly, or cordial, toward God. St. Paul has expressed this fact in plain words: "The carnal mind is enmity against God." Rom. 8: 7. But now when a person really does not believe in the deity, God is so completely crowded out of his consciousness that the soul is not aware of this hostility. What has probably happened in your case is that you were truly convicted of sin and made an honest decision to accept the Saviour and the truths of the Gospel, but your personal faith did not go quite far enough to grasp Christ as your actual Saviour and Friend. This is a very distressing situation, and you should insist upon going forward vigorously till you come to trust Christ fully and really believe that he does become your Saviour. You must believe that he does literally forgive your sins and that he does bring to you the gracious gift of new life. You must not wait for feeling before believing this. The feeling will follow the faith. You must believe that his promises are true and that he really keeps them for you. When you thus trust Christ to be your Redeemer and Friend you will find real peace in your soul and will discover that all enmity toward God has been removed. You will delight then in the spiritual atmosphere of religious services and worship and the thought of God will no longer be painful but delightful.

Reader, Chambersburg, Pa. I am not a Christian, but would like so much to be one. I pray to God to forgive my sins, but do not seem to get any answer. I do not know if it is lack of faith, or what is wrong.

It certainly is lack of faith that prevents your finding peace. Jesus has said very distinctly: "Him that cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out." After having received so many, he is not going to reject you. Begin to trust him and you will find the beginning of peace. And as you trust him the peace will grow stronger and deeper. Read carefully the answer to E. M. T., Virginia, in last week's Mail-Bag. Your case is very similar to his.

E. R., Salem, Ore. A friend and I are both natives of one of the warring nations of Europe. We both feel that our native country is altogether to blame for the present war. But while I admit freely to every one that our home country is wrong, he will admit it only to me, and looks upon me as a traitor for speaking against my country to people of another nationality. I contend, however, that it is more honorable to stand up for what is right than to stand up for my country. Is he right or am I?

You are certainly correct in feeling that the obligation to do right is a deeper obligation than to be loyal to one's country. The old adage: "My country right or wrong" is not in keeping with the soundest views of ethics and religion. The first duty of every soul is to obey God, and to be true to him, and no claim of patriotism could possibly take precedence over a counter claim of conscience. In the present instance, however, it may not be necessary for you to express your opinions freely except when asked direct questions, particularly since you are now residing in a neutral nation.

J. S. N., St. Marys, W. Va. We assume you refer to the sacrifice of Pele, the spirit which the heathen natives of one of the Hawaiian Islands worshiped many years ago. She was believed to be the goddess or the controlling spirit of a volcano, and there is a tradition that human sacrifices were offered to her, the victim, usually a young girl, being put in the crater of the volcano. We remember reading, many years ago, how Pele's priest officiated at these human sacrifices offered to appease the deity, the cessation of the eruption and the lava flow indicating that her vengeance was satisfied.

F. H. O., Rochester, N. Y. Next to the number seven, forty is most frequently used in the Bible. It is used to indicate a rounded or completed period, and is a symbol of completion. Thus, the Israelites were forty years in the wilderness; Moses, forty days and nights on Sinai; Saul, David and Solomon each reigned forty years, and the number occurs frequently in prophecy, giving the same sense of fulness or sufficiency.

Reader, West Point, Va. In the incident of the anointing as recorded in Mark 14: 3-9, there is no evidence that the woman who performed the office herself knew that she was anointing Christ for his burial. The Saviour's statement to that effect to his disciples was in the nature of a prophetic forecast, which none but he could speak. One commentator, dealing with this passage, says: "Not that she thought of his burial, much less reserved any of her hard to anoint her dead Lord; but as the time was so near at hand when that office was to be performed, and she was not to have that privilege even after the spices were brought for the purpose, he lovingly regards it as done now." Olshausen says: "In the act of love done to him, she has erected to herself an eternal monument. From generation to generation this remarkable prophecy of our Lord has been fulfilled; and we, in explaining this saying of our Redeemer, of necessity contribute to its accomplishment."

Paint Without Oil

Remarkable Discovery That Cuts Down the Cost of Paint Seventy-Five Per Cent.

Free Trial Package is Mailed to Everyone Who Writes

A. L. Rice, a prominent manufacturer of paints, N. Y., has discovered a process of making a new kind of paint without the use of oil. He calls it Powderpaint. It comes in the form of a dry powder and all that is required is to add water to make a paint weather proof, fire proof and as durable as oil paint. It adheres to any surface, wood, stone or brick, spreads and dries like oil paint and costs about one-fourth as much.

Write to Mr. A. L. Rice, Manuf'r., 85 North Adams, N. Y., and he will send you a free trial package, also color card and full information showing you how you can save a good many dollars. Write today.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETINGS

Solid Foundations of Life

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U.
Topic for February 14. I Cor. 3: 9-15 (Consecration Meeting)

FOUNDATIONS! We have need of them. Particularly now, when the minds of men are seething with new fears, new hopes, new loves, new hates, new doubts. Where is an abiding rock upon which we may build?

Paul tells us. "Other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ."

The civilization of Europe, while professedly built upon the name of Christ, was not built upon his spirit, and it is being torn to pieces. Problems which men struggle and agonize in vain to answer he settled calmly long ago. Every individual life and the life of every nation which is not built upon his spirit and his truth is doomed to fall, like the house which was built upon the sands.

We have heard this truth so many times that it seems almost needless to listen to it or read it again. But you will note that this is a consecration meeting, so the thing to be decided tonight is not "Will you admit that Christ is the right foundation?" but "Will you absolutely and unconditionally surrender yourself to him, determined to build upon no other foundation than his?" Will you say with Paul: "I am determined to know nothing save Jesus Christ and him crucified"? Will you agree that he henceforth is to be for you "wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption"? Until you make this great shift of your whole heart and life off from the foundations of self and altogether upon him, all your building will be insecure.

The Challenge of the Changing East

Epworth League Topic for February 14. Ezek. 43: 1, 2, 4-7; Mal. 3: 10

THE East is certainly changing. China working itself into a republic, banishing opium and overthrowing its ancient system of education for modern Western methods; Japan, which shut itself away from the world until Admiral Perry opened the gates in 1854, now one of the most progressive nations of the world, with modern customs and modern ideals and modern equipments, with religious liberty and an ever-widening welcome to Christian teaching; India, putting away its immoralities, so long practiced in the name of religion, abolishing child marriages, beginning to free itself from the steel grip of the insane and deadly caste system, stirred by mighty Pentecostal revivals; Turkey—who can say what will be happening in Turkey during the next few months? The London Chronicle recently suggested editorially that the time might come when America would establish a suzerainty over the new Palestine which may be created, for which American missionary, educational and charitable work there may be found to have prepared the way.

Already the church has taken splendid advantage of these rapidly changing conditions. Real spiritual victories have been achieved, of which the vigorous Japanese Methodist Church, organized a few years ago, to be independent of any foreign missions board, is an example. Japan will welcome the World's Sunday School Convention in 1916. Oriental conditions are indeed a challenge, a call to the church. We must try to mold these changing conditions according to the pattern of Christ. Great world-changes are taking place. The church must be alert, ablaze, dynamic, to turn it toward God. Find your place, high or humble, in these great tasks, and fill it faithfully.

Florida Oranges and Grapefruit Ripened Under Nature's Smiles

Citrus fruits came first to Florida of all America—were the heritage of the State from its Spanish discoverer. In no part of the world have oranges and grapefruit attained the perfection they have reached in their adopted "Land of Flowers." The soil and sunshine—the ocean breezes and the summer showers—develop and ripen the fruit in Florida as nowhere else. Every Florida orange and grapefruit which ripens on the tree is filled with citric acid, tempered, sweetened and enriched to a most delicious flavor.

The progressive citrus fruit growers of Florida work together in a co-operative organization for the mutual protection of themselves and the consumers of oranges and grapefruit. This is known as the

FLORIDA CITRUS EXCHANGE

Bought in boxes on which the above mark is branded in red, Florida oranges and grapefruit will be found heavy with juice, delightfully sweet and delicately flavored. Only tree-ripened citrus fruits are good and wholesome—hence Exchange growers do not ship their crops to market until fully ripe. In season Florida Citrus Exchange fruit can be secured from most dealers—yours will get it for you if you insist.

There are many ways of serving oranges and grapefruit. They are both food and drink and may be used in confections and cookery. Booklet containing scores of recipes for the use of citrus fruits mailed for 4 cents in stamps. Address, Florida Citrus Exchange, 625 Citizens' Bank Bldg., Tampa, Fla.

"I RESOLVE—"

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

DID you ever pray for rain, and have a great splashing thunder-storm loom up out of the horizon? Did you ever wish for a good book and have somebody send you a gloriously large set of them? Did you ever want a tiny nose-gay of violets and suddenly walk into a glowing patch of color, waiting for your hand to pick?

When, just a month ago, I asked my girls to write and tell me of their resolutions, I was praying for a shower, wishing for a book, hunting for violets. And in answer to my request I received a flood of letters that more than satisfied me. Although I cannot use all of them, I am going to show you a few of the sweetest.

This resolution comes from Illinois: "Knowing that 'a merry heart doeth good like medicine, and a cheerful spirit bringeth light out of darkness,' it is my ambition and purpose for the new year to become a sunshiny member of the circle in which I move. To live the rôle of a cheerful one, so that weariness and doubt and care and gloom may be dispelled in the homes of my community, and peace and joy and hope and strength and courage be given the weak and discouraged ones."

Another letter comes from Pennsylvania:

"I resolve," it says, "to try to live a more consistent Christian life, striving each day to do a little for the advancement of His kingdom whom I try to serve, and thus prepare myself for a greater work for him. F. A. N."

A very new friend of mine from Ohio sends in quite a list of her promises to herself. She has them numbered:

"1. To be true to my God, to myself and to others.

"2. To be happier, so that the sun in my life may be always shining—especially in any time of need.

"3. To be more faithful, and above all more thankful, to Him who has done so much for me."

Two wonderful resolutions, that I think would be an inspiration to any girl, come to me from Tennessee:

"For 1915 I made two resolutions, whereas I usually make many; but I mean that these shall be the 'keeping kind' and am sealing them air-tight. I am going in for the old rule, 'quality rather than quantity.'

"The first rule I am going to compel myself to follow is: To do one good turn each week of this year for somebody—something not at all required of me, nor in any regular line of duty, but something that I know is going to make somebody glad and that will give me a satisfied feeling. It may be nothing more than lending a good book to a friend, or a gift of a jar of preserves to one not having an opportunity to make them, or a visit to a sick friend, at which I tell everything cheerful I can think of.

"The second rule is to imbibe the Pollyanna spirit as much as I can; then live up to it as nearly as possible for one knowing a great many of the world's heartbreaks.

"Mrs. J. M. S."

From New York State a resolution comes to me that tells me a whole story in a few words:

"As for New Year's resolutions," says the letter, "I am resolved to pass on to some one, each day of this coming year, one or more choice lines from God's Word; and I shall make a collection for that purpose of such as I need myself."

A. J. B."

A very interesting letter from Pennsylvania carries a rather novel idea with it: "My resolve," it reads, "is in the future to 'take time enough,' as my mother used to say. Hurrying without need shows an ill-ordered mind, causes mistakes and fatigue, and in short is—stupid.

"In order to be concrete in this letter, I sat at our front window from ten to eleven Saturday morning, tabulating the adult passers-by as 'tense' or 'natural.' We saw all kinds, from wealthy ladies to tramps, and thirty-three per cent. were either tearing along or had their mouths open (which is a sign of nerve strain). The old fable of the hare and tortoise has here a twentieth-century application."

"M. S. T."

Last of all, I am going to give you a small resolution from my own state, that I think all of my girls should be able to keep:

"I am going to get nearer to people," it whispers gently, "to try to help them, and to know them, and love them. I am going to be interested in the little things of life instead of dreaming and passing them by. I am going to try to help—if it is only a word; and give—if it is only a smile!"

One day, not long ago, I was walking along a road which was sprinkled lightly with tiny white pebbles. I picked one up, and as it lay, small and ineffectual, in the hollow of my hand, I wondered what good such a tiny thing could do. I was still pondering when I saw a column higher than my head loom up in front of me, and as I drew near I noticed that it was made of thousands of these same white pebbles, and that it marked a dangerous bit of road. As I stood before it, where it gleamed whitely in the sunlight, my question was answered.

Girls, dear, a grain of sand is a little thing, but the vast beaches are made of them; a drop of water is very small, but the ocean is composed of myriad drops. Perhaps, when you remember, as you think of your resolutions, that they are small, it will make your heart grow just a bit lighter and your pulses beat a bit faster to know that they are being held in the hollow of an Almighty hand and that God is planning some noble work for them to do.

OUR NATIONAL DISEASE

Caused by Coffee.

Physicians know that drugs will not correct the evils caused by coffee and that the only remedy is to stop drinking it.

An Arkansas doctor says:

"I was a coffee drinker for many years and often thought that I could not do without it, but after years of suffering with our national malady, dyspepsia, I attributed it to the drinking of coffee, and after some thought, determined to use Postum for my morning drink.

"I had the Postum made carefully according to directions on the pkg. and found it just suited my taste.

"At first I used it only for breakfast, but I found myself getting so much better, that I had it at all meals, and I am pleased to say that I have been relieved of indigestion. I gained 19 pounds in 4 months and my general health is greatly improved.

"I must tell you of a young lady in Illinois. She had been in ill health for many years, the vital forces low, with but little pain. I wrote her of the good that Postum did me and advised her to try it.

"At the end of the year, she wrote me that she had gained 40 pounds in weight and felt like herself again."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Postum comes in two forms: Regular Postum—must be well boiled. 15c and 25c packages. Instant Postum—is a soluble powder. A teaspoonful dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water, and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. 30c and 50c tins.

The cost per cup of both kinds is about the same.

"There's a Reason" for Postum.

No More Plaster Walls!

From cellar to attic—every room in the house is better, cleaner, more sanitary and attractive if finished with Bishopric Wall Board—and it costs but half as much as plaster.

Bishopric Wall Board is simply a modern combination of time-tried materials and principles used by master builders for ages past. Enduring satisfaction assured.

BISHOPRIC WALL BOARD

"Can't Crack, Buckle or Pull Loose"

Used in all kinds of buildings. The homeowner's greatest aid to quick and lasting walls and ceilings. Does away with all old lath and plaster muck and necessity for skilled labor. Ready for use just as it comes. Put it on yourself.

Made of genuine Asphalt Mastic, stiffened with kiln-dried lath and surfaced with heavy fibre-board. Moisture-proof and vermin-proof. Goes on dry and saves month's time in building. You can easily add to the value of your outbuildings. Wall board will make them warmer in winter, cooler in summer.

liked to be there. At first, to be sure, he had hesitated; but very soon he had quieted his doubts and yielded to his longings by telling himself (and Pollyanna) that, after all, visiting was not "staying for keeps."

Mrs. Carew often found the boy and Pollyanna contentedly settled on the library window-seat, with the empty wheel-chair close by. Sometimes they were poring over a book. (She heard Jamie tell Pollyanna one day that he didn't think he'd mind so very much being lame if he had so many books as Mrs. Carew, and that he guessed he'd be so happy he'd fly clean away if he had both books and legs.) Sometimes the boy was telling stories, and Pollyanna was listening, wild-eyed and absorbed.

Mrs. Carew wondered at Pollyanna's interest—until one day she herself stopped and listened. After that she wondered no longer—but she listened a good deal longer. Crude and incorrect as was much of the boy's language, it was always wonderfully vivid and picturesque, so that Mrs. Carew found herself, hand in hand with Pollyanna, trailing down the Golden Ages at the beck of a glowing-eyed boy.

Dimly Mrs. Carew was beginning to realize, too, something of what it must mean to be in spirit and ambition the center of brave deeds and wonderful adventures, while in reality one was only a crippled boy in a wheel-chair. But what Mrs. Carew did not realize was the part that this crippled boy was beginning to play in her own life. She did not realize how much a matter of course his presence was becoming, nor how much interested she now was in finding something new "for Jamie to see." Neither did she realize how, day by day, he was coming to seem to her more and more the lost Jamie.

As February, March and April passed, however, and May came, bringing with it the near approach of the date set for Pollyanna's home-going, Mrs. Carew suddenly awoke to what that home-going was to mean to her.

She was amazed and appalled. Up to now she had, in belief, looked forward with pleasure to the departure of Pollyanna. She had said that then once again the house would be quiet, with the glaring sun shut out. Once again she would be at peace, and able to hide herself away from the annoying, tiresome world. Once again she would be free to summon to her aching consciousness all those dear memories of the lost little lad who had so long ago stepped into that vast unknown and closed the door behind him.

But now that Pollyanna was really going home, the picture was far different. The longed-for "peace" would be "wretched loneliness"; and as for her being able to "hide herself from the annoying, tiresome world," and "free to summon to her aching consciousness all those dear memories of that lost little lad"—just as if anything could blot out those other aching memories of the new Jamie (who yet might be the old Jamie) with his pitiful, pleading eyes!

Full well now Mrs. Carew knew that without Pollyanna the house would be empty; but that without the lad Jamie it would be worse than that. To her pride this knowledge was not pleasing. To her heart it was torture—since the boy had twice said he would not come. For a time, during those last few days of Pollyanna's stay, the struggle was a bitter one, though pride always kept the ascendency. Then, on what Mrs. Carew knew would be Jamie's last visit, her heart triumphed, and once more she asked Jamie to come and be to her the Jamie that was lost.

What she said she never could remember afterwards; but what the boy said she never forgot. After all, it was compassed in six short words.

For what seemed a long, long minute his eyes searched her face; then to his own had come a transfiguring light, as he breathed:

"Oh, yes! Why, you—care, now!"

Wouldn't You Like to Own a Store

Like This?

Wouldn't you like to be proprietor of a money-making business? Once I was just a struggling candy maker. The profits from Crispettes, the new, delicious, popcorn confection, built this business for me. The very same proposition that made me so, should be the same for you. Best season just ahead. Don't slave them away for some one else. Start in the Crispette Business for yourself. Build a business of your own and I'll get you a small store—a cozy nook where the rent is low. Keep all the profits. I'll teach you the Crispette business—tell you how to succeed—show you how to make Crispettes by my special secret formula. I'll do it right here in Springfield—personally or by mail. But the thing for you to do is to Come to See Me At My Expense

Don't say you're coming. Just drop in quietly. Call on my banker or any bank. Ask them about Long about my reputation. See if folks think I'll give you a square deal. Then come and see my store—see that it's just like the picture. See the machine. See Crispettes made—make a batch yourself. Learn the business. Get my pointers on how to succeed. Up to a distance of 100 miles I'll pay all your traveling expenses, if you buy a machine. You'll see—know—learn everything. It's simple—easy. Won't take you a day. I'll be glad to see you—glad to show you the store and I have a good talk with you. You'll go home ready to make more money than you ever made in your life.

Every Nickel You Take In Nets You Almost Four Cents Profit

Think of it! Think of the fortunes made in 5-cent pieces. It's one business in a hundred. Everybody likes Crispettes—children—parents and folks. One sale always means two—two means four. So it goes. It's a great business. I found it so—so should you. Send for my big free book "How to make money in the Crispette business"—48 pages illustrated—complete information and story of how I built my business. Read it and then come to Springfield.

THE PRAYER LEAGUE

A GRATEFUL mother writes: "My prayers have been answered for one who has been away for four years. Often I did not know where he was for months at a time. But I never gave up, and this holiday season brought him home to me. I have had such a happy Christmas." Mrs. James Rogers writes from Superior, Mont.: "The Lord answered many prayers for me, especially one for cure from cancer of the mouth. It was my last trial, as I knew the doctor failed to heal me. I went to the Lord in prayer and he healed me." Mrs. T. T. G., of Lott, Texas, writes: "I wish to acknowledge the healing of what was thought to be a cancer on my husband's face, of ten years' standing." B. G. writes from Bearden, Tenn.: "Some time since I wrote to the Prayer League, asking special prayer in behalf of a revival in our community. I am glad to report good results from the revival." A Subscriber writes: "Some time ago I asked the League to pray for the restoration of my wife's mind. I thank God that she is much improved."

A Canadian physician writes: "I wish to acknowledge thankfully the answer to your prayers which were joined to mine for deliverance from financial difficulties and also from a criminal charge made against me; also my health has been restored." Some of our readers will well remember this case and will rejoice with this friend in his deliverance from difficulties.

Mrs. M. E. F. writes from Nebraska: "For about ten years I have had some kind of lung trouble. Two doctors pronounced it tuberculosis. Two years ago I was bed-fast, and it was thought I could not last long. About a year ago I began to pray. I prayed almost constantly for three weeks until I got the prayer habit and kept it up for months, and have been as well as most women of my age, not far from seventy. I wish to give God the glory, and thank the Christian Herald for the first idea of healing through prayer."

W. T. R. writes from Wisconsin: "I feel your prayers have saved me from financial ruin."

Acknowledgments of answers to prayer have been received from:

E. L., Virginia (for overcoming a temptation); C. W., Ohio (for relief from a burden); S. S., Nebraska; C. E. M., Rutland, B. C.; P. H., San Diego, Calif.; An Anxious Daughter, Gillett, Ill.; Mrs. J. A telegram comes from Mrs. J. A. Hardy, of Portsmouth, Va., the "mother of the Prayer League": "Please pray for my friend who is hurt and in the hospital." A friend, who has written before to ask prayers that help and an opportunity for work as a teacher be found, writes again to repeat the request. The home has been broken up because of the lack of an opening for work and he is almost in despair.

J. O. J. writes to ask prayer for the speedy adjustment of a long-drawn-out financial trouble. From his statement of the case he seems to have suffered great wrong and greatly needs the prayers of the League. Mrs. M. K. asks special prayer for the conversion of her grandson, who recently heard one of his professors make the statement that there is no God. One of the Prayer League's very best friends has written several times asking prayer that her daughter be saved from a worldly life. She repeats this request, and it is earnestly desired that all the members of the League unite in fervent prayer for the return of this young woman to the spirit. Mrs. L. B. asks prayer that a terian minister be sent to the nity of Amsterdam, Ohio. her husband lost their son by de wish to welcome to their own young servant of the Lord to place.

Thirty friends ask prayer f tal restoration or strengthen relatives or themselves.

Maxwell

Every Road is a Maxwell Road

The $695, "1915" Maxwell is a year-round car. Maxwell owners do not put their cars in dead storage during the winter months. Snow, slush, or mud never close roads against the powerful light-weight Maxwell "Wonder Car." It is an all-weather car.

The Maxwell is one of the greatest hill climbing cars in the world. Its wonderfully flexible motor, which may be throttled down to 4 miles an hour on high gear, and quickly picked up to 50 miles an hour, makes it the ideal car for use on rough roads or in traffic.

Holds the Road at 50 Miles an Hour

Although the price of the "1915" Maxwell has been reduced to $695, seventeen new features have been added.

Especially notable is the adjustable front seat, which may be moved forward or backward three inches to suit the leg length of the driver. This is an improvement not found in any other automobile irrespective of price. It is typical of the advanced design of the Maxwell car.

The double shell radiator of the Maxwell is equipped with a shock-absorbing device. This relieves it of jolts and jars, and makes the Maxwell famous for its freedom from radiator leaks.

The other fifteen new features show that the Maxwell is a thoroughly up-to-date car, containing the highest-grade improvements.

I enclose herewith 10c, for which send catalogue "Everything for the Garden," "Henderson's Garden Plans" and "Henderson's Specialty Collection" as advertised in your special offer in the Christian Herald.

High Cost of Living sufficient emphasis has not been placed on the possibility of every man holding a partial solution of this great question in his own hands, of every consumer being his own producer. At a little expense for seeds, a small plot of ground, even so small as 25x50 feet, will grow all the vegetables an average family will consume. During the summer half of your living expense is for the things that should come out of your own garden. Latter day methods and higher quality of seeds have made it possible to cultivate the small tract so that a plot 25x50 feet with a reasonable amount of cultivation and planted with seeds of high germination should supply all the vegetables required by a family of six or eight. You do not have to share the profits of your own garden with jobbers, middlemen or retailers.

Tested Seeds

To get the best results it is necessary to get the best seeds. Every packet of Henderson's Seeds that is sold has behind it the experience of 68 years of successful seed growing and selling. The methods of seed testing and trials that were the best three generations ago have been improved and bettered by us from year to year, and are, today, still the best. The initial cost of the seeds is really the smallest part of your garden expense, and it pays to be sure you have started right. Henderson's are Tested Seeds.

"Henderson's Garden Plans"

These are suggested layouts for your garden prepared by men who are thoroughly capable. One of our customers writes us, "I have found them of immense value in laying out my garden." There is also a series of condensed cultural directions that are unusually good.

"Everything for the Garden" is the title of our annual catalogue. It is a book of 204 pages, handsomely bound, with a beautifully embossed cover, 8 colored plates and 1000 illustrations, most of them half-tones, direct from photographs, showing actual results without exaggeration. It is a library of everything worth while, either in farm or garden.

*Oh, songs of a race that with arrow and knife
Went swift through the forests to roam . . .
The war-cries are silent, and calm-faced they stay
In peace by the door of their home.*

— never more than a town away from Studebaker Service

It's simply this: that Studebaker MAKES SURE.
—and makes sure not only in the manufacturing that goes on in the gigantic plants at Detroit, but also in the running of the car on the roads AFTER it is in your hands.

For example, you may never need a front axle forging so strong that it can be TWISTED 3 TIMES without even showing signs of fracture. But if the emergency ever arises, it is there in the car. For Studebaker has MADE SURE.

And so, although you may never need Studebaker Service outside the town or, at most, of the State you live in—Studebaker makes sure that it is there if you want it.

For it is Studebaker's ideal not only to manufacture a car as GOOD as any car possibly CAN be—but also to insure that car's giving to its owner EVERY- day service and freedom from expense and full money's worth of pleasure for every dollar of the price.

And so Studebaker MAKES SURE of Service—and day by day is dotting the country with new Service Stations—building up a National Service organization of Studebaker Branches and Studebaker Dealers and Studebaker Service Stations so COMPLETE that wherever you drive you are “never more than a town away from Studebaker Service.”

And the reason for it all is simply “—because it's a Studebaker”—because this car carries a name that for 63 years has stood for the highest achievements in vehicles of every nature—a name that has come to be a PROMISE to the buyer of honesty of manufacture AND day-after-day service.

And so not only in this matter of giving Service to Studebaker owners, but in every little detail of manufacturing, you find this Studebaker policy of MAKING SURE the buyer gets FULL money's worth

— because it's a

RUSSIAN COSSACKS IN POLISH CITY AFTER RETREAT OF GERMANS

CITADEL OF CRACOW AND KOSCIUSZKO MEMORIAL RISING BEYOND IT

IN DEVASTATED GALICIA

VIVID IMPRESSIONS OF A JOURNEY IN OLD
POLAND BEFORE THE DECLARATION OF WAR

BY REV. FRANCIS E. CLARK, D.D., LL.D.

Poland looked to Cracow as its chief city. It still retains much of its ancient charm.

On the way from Lemberg to Cracow, we pass through that fortified town whose pronunciation has puzzled so many newspaper readers, and whose sad fate has shocked the world, for if all reports are to be believed, Przemysl is are to be believed, Przemysl is a mausoleum for the dead—not a beautiful and stately tomb, but one filled with ruins and blackened walls and rotting bodies, after these long months of bombardment and carnage.

Cracow, like Warsaw, though belonging to a different power, is situated on the River Vistula: Warsaw nearer to the mouth of the river, Cracow on its upper stretches where it joins forces with the Rudowa. One of the unfading memory photographs in my mental gallery is of a soft, hazy October morning, when we wandered just outside the city walls to the confluence of these two streams. A boatman was lazily poling his skiff up the Vistula; the cattle were grazing on either bank; the great hayricks declared the bountiful harvest of the year, and it was altogether as peaceful and charming a rural landscape as I ever saw. How all this must now be changed! Even if Cracow is not fully invested as these words are read, it can be nothing else than an armed camp, war and not agriculture the business of the day. Stately St. Mary's Church and the great cathedral, the Westminster Abbey of Poland, and the beautiful old Tuch Haus, with its priceless museum, are awaiting daily the destruction of hostile bombs and ruthless aeroplanes.

"Cracow is in very truth," it has been said, "the Holy City of Poland; about it cluster the dearest and most precious memories of Polish national life. Here rise its stateliest monuments, here lie its famous dead. Although for 120 years Poland has vanished from the muster-roll of the nations of the earth, Cracow remains the center of Polish thought, of Polish art, of the hope of national resurrection."

In the annals of education and the higher learning, Cracow has long held an honorable place. Here was established in 1364 one of the first universities in Europe, established by the great King Casimir and known as the Jagellonian University. Erected the very year that Columbus discovered America, the old buildings are still standing, and the charming Gothic court contains a bronze statue of Copernicus, the most famous alumnus of the university. There he stands in enduring bronze in the center of the courtyard which his feet so often pressed, holding in his hand a sidereal globe, while he seems to reason out the astonishing fact that the earth moves around the sun, instead of the sun around the earth, as hitherto mankind had always believed.

But of all the historic buildings in Cracow, rich as it is in memories of the past, the cathedral (or

IF THEY would confess the truth, many Americans would have to acknowledge that their idols of the geography and history of Galicia, the war-swept northern province of Austria-Hungary, are very hazy. Until this war, which has cleared up many things geographical for us, many of us were uncertain whether Galicia belonged to Austria or Spain, since the latter country has a province of the same name; or perhaps we confused it with Galicia, the Roman province in Asia Minor, to which Paul wrote one of his epistles.

The slight offset to the awful evils of the war has been the increase of the world's geographical knowledge. We have learned among other things that the Galicia where the battle rages is the most northern province of Austria, lying on the southern borders of Russia. On the west are Bohemia and Moravia, with the little province of Silesia between; while on the east the neighboring Austrian province of Bukowina separates it from Rumania.

Galicia bends around Hungary to the south in a bow-shaped fashion. Some one has compared Hungary to the kernel and Galicia to the shell of the nut, which is not a bad comparison, except that the shell does not go entirely around the kernel. If we carry the comparison further, we might say that Russia has found it a very hard nut to crack, and that, in the process, the poor shell has been pounded and cracked and broken into many fragments.

As I saw Galicia a few months ago, in traveling across the whole length of this bow-shaped province, I was reminded of our own upland prairie states, North and South Dakota and western Kansas and Nebraska. The same general contour of rolling prairie; the same general climate, a trifle less severe than our northwest, perhaps; and much the same products—wheat and rye and barley and oats, with some Indian corn in the southern portions. Be sure, there is a difference in the character of the people, and their outlook on life. The poverty of our own prairies, where poverty exists, is the poverty of youth; the poverty of those just starting life. The poverty of Galicia—and it is a poor country—is the far more hopeless poverty of age: a country ravaged by war many times during the last thousand years; of a country partitioned, repartitioned, and partitioned again among its various conquerors, since it fell from its glorious estate as part of the ancient kingdom of Poland.

This is the part of old Poland which at last became Austria's share, and its territory is about the size of West Virginia. One picturesque feature which interests every traveler, as he looks from the car window, is the goose-girls tending their flocks of squawking, hissing geese, and often knitting long stockings or mufflers, as they leisurely follow their feathered bipeds to fresh fields and pastures new. Many shepherds, too, one sees, enveloped in stiff white garments of wool that stand out from the body almost like a tent. Indeed, the garment often serves for shelter at night as well as for clothing by day. The flocks they tend are sometimes pitifully small, and one wonders at the absence of fences or stone walls; but the explanation is simple. Men and women are cheaper than rails and barbed wire, and to hire a goose-girl or a shepherd costs the farmer less than to run three strands of wire around his pasture. No wonder that so many from Galicia have sought new homes across the sea, where wire and stones are cheaper than human labor.

The horsemen and horsemanship of Galicia have long been famous. Here and in the neighboring plains to the north the Cossack troops of Russia originated. Anton Malczewski, an immensely popular poet of Poland, wrote a spirited poem about the Cossack, of which I can quote but a single stanza:

On, lit by the setting sun; onward ever driven.
Like some messenger he seems, sent to me from heaven.
You may hear his horse's hoof echo half a mile hence:
Over all that mighty steppe lies a brooding silence.

Lemberg (or Lwow in Polish) is the capital of Galicia and is a thriving city of modern appearance, with some interesting ancient buildings. Though Poles are the leading citizens and outclass all others in numbers and influence, Lemberg is also the headquarters of the Ruthenians or Little Russians. Twenty-four thousand of these sturdy people every year come to America. At first the rulers of Austria tried in every way to check this emigration, but they found it impossible to prevent the attraction of moral and economic gravitation which pulled the would-be emigrant to America.

Many good stories are told of their hairbreadth escapes to the land of the free. "One man, as he reached the German frontier, was arrested by a gendarme. The Ruthenian stopped, as if to tie his shoe, picked up a handful of mud and threw it in the gendarme's face. Blinded for a few moments by the mud, he did not see his wily prisoner bound across the line into Germany, where he could not follow to bring him back. Thence he made his way to Bremen and thus escaped to America."

If Lemberg is the political capital of Galicia of Austrian Poland, Cracow is the literary, the artistic, the historic capital, for at one time all of ancient

NEW LIGHT ON LABOR

FACTS AND OPINIONS BROUGHT OUT BY THE FEDERAL COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS NOW IN SESSION AT NEW YORK INVESTIGATING THE GREAT PHILANTHROPIC FOUNDATIONS

LOUIS D. BRANDEIS

THE Eastern daily papers of January 28 published a photograph which is worth attention for its artistic merit alone. It shows an eager, earnest, gray-haired woman shaking hands with a handsome and almost equally earnest young man. Both faces show kindness—the woman's face an intense, piercing sort of kindness, kindness that is willing to fight for those she loves; the young man's face a wistful kindness, kindness mixed with perplexity, kindness that has not yet found a satisfactory method of expression and outlet.

But if the artistic value of the picture is considerable, its historic significance, its promise of hope for the future of civilization is vastly greater; indeed, it is immeasurable. The gray-haired woman was "Mother" Jones, the heroine of almost every great labor strike for a generation, the loved and trusted friend and champion of labor; the young man was John D. Rockefeller, Jr., heir to the greatest fortune in the world.

And the young man is asking the old woman to go with him to Colorado, the scene of almost the bitterest strife in the whole history of the conflict between capital and labor, to study with him the conditions of the laborers and their families there.

There have been hours, and almost days, during the present session at New York of the Federal Commission on Industrial Relations when the real purpose of this particular investigation seemed to be lost sight of. That purpose was to determine whether the great welfare foundations, notably the Rockefeller, the Carnegie and the Russell Sage Foundations, were a menace to democratic government. But in seeking information on this subject, Chairman Walsh and his colleagues on the commission probed deep into the fundamental conditions existing in the relationship of the workers and the capitalists.

Perhaps never before was so imposing an array of representatives of great wealth placed as witnesses at a public hearing in such rapid succession. Samuel Untermyer, Daniel Guggenheim, Jacob H. Schiff, August Belmont, Henry Ford, George W. Perkins and John D. Rockefeller, Jr., followed one another to the witness stand within a week. But more striking still, these men almost without exception expressed an attitude toward labor altogether different from anything that could have been expected twenty years ago.

Public interest grew intense as Henry Ford outlined and explained the Utopia he has created for workingmen at Detroit, and reached its climax when young Mr. Rockefeller, after having invited Mother Jones to a conference with him at his office, added his invitation to the veteran strike leader to visit the Colorado mine fields with him.

Frank M. Walsh, chairman of the commission, speaking to an East Side audience on Sunday of the week in which these capitalists were to be called, gave a clear indication of the purpose and spirit of the investigation. The public was electrified and to some extent dubious, fearing his zeal for the laboring class was so great that he would find it difficult to conduct the investigation fairly and dispassionately. But day by day the conviction grew that the task had been put into the hands of the right man, bent only on finding the truth. After the surprise of Mr. Walsh's speech, the public received its second shock in reading the testimony of Mr. Untermyer. "Capitalism," he said, "is more powerful, more rampant, more despotic and less controlled by law or public sentiment here than in any other country." He made the statement, after naming nine great railroad systems, that "a handful of men in this city have a potential control over the relations between the railroads and their employers, and can dictate practically a uniform policy toward labor whenever occasion requires. It is a vastly more powerful organization than the organization of labor." He favored "insurance against sickness and invalidity and unemployment, and old-age pensions, life and accident insurance and maternity benefits. The employer, the employee, the state and the local community should contribute toward the sickness, invalidity and unemployment insurance, as well as old-age pensions. The state should conduct industrial insurance through the existing companies."

Daniel Guggenheim said: "I favor the Federal Government and the states helping men to find work, and when the workingman is sick the state should see he is attended to properly. The problem is too big for the state alone. It is too big for the employer alone. The two must get together and co-operate with the workingman. The workingman does not only want higher wages. He wants something higher—comforts for himself and family. He will get them and he should get them."

The most thrillingly interesting testimony of all was given by Henry Ford. He told of the increased happiness, prosperity and morality of his employees and their families since his great profit-sharing plan has gone into operation. Describing the motives which led to the formation of the plan, he said: "Our first purpose was substantial justice to our co-workers, without whom we could have accomplished nothing. We had had great success, we desired no greater success from a mere financial point of view. We do not regard it in any way as a gift or charity, but a reward for service."

"The company," he said, "had the courage to seize an opportunity for breaking away from old habits and customs that were possibly applicable to other periods. The institution of a new order, treating men like men, in man fashion, as brought out much of human salvage and provided that barriers between employers and employees, thought to exist and often existing, can be largely removed."

"No man can bring up a family and hold it on the ordinary rates of wages. We cannot expect a man to give us his best efforts when he is in debt and has not enough to support his family on."

He stated that eight thousand families had changed their places of residence since the plan was put into operation. An investigation showed that they have moved from poor and squalid quarters to sanitary localities with environments conducive to health, happiness and comfort.

JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER, JR., stated in contrast to published reports, he is in favor of giving laborers full rights to organize. He stated that he disapproved of any effort on the part of a corporation to control politics, and a director would favor the discharge of any executive of a company who attempted so to influence the election of public officers. When the matter was brought to his attention that an officer of the Colorado Fuel and Iron Company had in a personal letter implied that the utterances of a certain minister were being carefully observed, he testified that he believed thoroughly in the right of free speech, and that no corporation ought to endeavor to control the utterances of the spiritual leaders of the people. He described the new arrangements with the workers at the mines, stating that in the future they would be able to act together, united by bosses or other representatives of the company, and that their statements would receive due consideration.

Louis D. Brandeis, Samuel Gompers and Ida M. Tarbell also gave important testimony. Reports of the further hearings will be given in a subsequent article, dealing more particularly with the subject of the conduct of the great foundations.

In Devastated Galicia

Schlosskirche) is the most interesting, not only because of its antiquity and its intrinsic magnificence, but largely because of the great men who are here sleeping their last sleep. The kings, the warriors, the poets, the artists of Poland here mingle their dust—bad kings and good kings, slaughterers of their fellow men and fighters for righteousness and freedom like Sobieski and Kosciuszko are here buried. The great predominance of kings and successful warriors shows how much more not only Cracow, but the world, honors men of blood and iron than honest worth of mind and soul. Nevertheless, the list of warriors is relieved by the name of the great poet, Mickiewicz, and a few others of like character, while the monuments by that greatest of bronze workers, Peter Vischer, and the greatest of modern sculptors, Thorwaldsen, make the cathedral of undying interest to every traveler.

The greatest monument of all, however, is not in the cathedral, but is a few miles from the city, and is simply an artificial hill, thrown up by the brawny arms and the loving hearts of the people of Cracow, high and low, in memory of Kosciuszko, Poland's greatest patriot and hero. Even if the beautiful churches of Cracow are battered down, the university destroyed and the last resting place of kings and poets desecrated (which may heaven forbid!) Kosciuszko Hill, erected by the personal and grateful labors of all Cracow, is likely to remain throughout the ages to come, a worthy monument, not only to one of Poland's but to one of America's heroes; for Kosciuszko helped us to win some of the chief battles of the Revolutionary War, and found an exile's home in America when his efforts to free his own beloved land had failed. Mr. Lothrop Stoddard has truly said, "The name of Cracow must evoke a responsive thrill in the breast of every Pole, whether owing reluctant allegiance to Russia, Austria or Prussia, or living in sorrowful exile in some distant corner of the world."

In the meantime, let us of America do our utmost to relieve the distresses of this heroic people, whom not only Europe but America, the present home of millions of them, owes so much.

TALKING ACROSS THE CONTINENT

At 4.30 P.M. at New York, January 26 (1.30 in San Francisco), the inventor of the telephone, Dr. Alexander Graham Bell, in the presence of a distinguished company, in the room of the president of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company at 15 Dey Street, spoke to his life-long associate, Thomas A. Watson, in San Francisco, over a 3,400-mile wire. Ordinary instruments were used, and the conversation was conducted with ease and clearness. For the first time of the thing, Dr. Bell had his original telephone of October, 1876, attached in place of the present instrument, and continued the conversation with equal ease. In the wire that forms the circuit from New York to San Francisco was also incorporated the piece of wire over which Dr. Bell and Watson had conducted their earliest experiments years ago.

At the different stations along the transcontinental line groups of intensely interested men were gathered to listen to the historic conversation over instruments connected with the line. Theodore N. Vail, president of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company, who was at Jekyll Island, connected with the line by way of Boston and New York, talked to Mr. Watson in San Francisco, a distance of 4,750 miles. President Wilson at Washington entered into the event and conversed with Mr. Watson, and then with Mr. Watson, to whom he expressed his admiration "for the inventive genius and scientific knowledge that have made it possible to talk across America possible." Then the president and Dr. Bell continued the conversation; Dr. Bell, in reply to congratulations, declared that the telephone system of the United States was the result of a great many minds, not of one alone. The president replied: "But there has been one dominant mind."

The performance by the modern telephone was nearly a wonder. The world is so surfeited with scientific marvels today that twenty-four hours are about all we can devote to surprise and interest in even so great an achievement as this. In fact, the ink that printed the story was hardly dry before new type was set to herald the near approach of wireless communication across seas and continents.

The history of the telephone covers a period of but forty years, yet the beneficial effect of that invention upon all business and social life is impossible of computation. We would be like a race of cripples today without it. Yet forty years ago the thing was conceived by accident. Alexander Graham Bell, the inventor, and his co-worker, Thomas Augustus Watson, were trying to perfect a new telegraph instrument which would take care of two or more messages simultaneously. In the afternoon of June 2, 1875, a loosened spring at one end of the experimental wire the two men were using accidentally sent audible notice of its condition along the wire to another part of the building—a very different performance from that of telegraphy. Surprised at the sound he heard, Mr. Bell traced it to its source and in his investigation suddenly conceived the idea of a similar transmission by wire of the sound of the human voice. Sixteen months later, on October 9, 1876, this inspiration materialized in a working telephone.

THE TRANSCONTINENTAL TELEPHONE LINE

That first telephone line stretched between Boston and Cambridge—two miles. By 1882 the line had been extended from Boston to Providence, a distance of forty-five miles; two years later New York and Boston were linked over a line 234 miles long; then by 1892, New York and Chicago, 900 miles. The limit of the telephone had now been reached, according to popular belief. But those who were at the heart of the industry knew better. Longer and longer grew the distance over which it became possible to talk by wire, until, in 1911, the country actually gasped at the news that New York and Denver, 2,100 miles apart, could talk to each other as easily as New York and Boston. And now the telephone spans the continent.

In noting the latest triumph of the telephone over space, a word about the principle of the instrument may be interesting as faintly indicating the difficulties in the way of long-distance communication.

The electrically sensitized copper wire transforms sound waves into electrical waves projected at a velocity of 56,000 miles a second. Sound waves travel through the air 1,160 feet per second. The telephone carries the voice from New York to San Francisco in one-fifteenth of a second. If it were possible for the voice to travel that distance through the air by sound waves it would take four hours.

To conceive of the countless distinct electrical waves set up by a conversation over the telephone, racing practically instantaneously over a wire 3,400 miles long to arrive undiminished in strength and unchanged in character, so that the sound waves into which they are then retransformed will be recognized by the listener as the very tones of the speaker, and to understand that an ordinary conversation requires millions of such currents, is to gain at least a faint idea of the problem that was solved when New York and San Francisco talked to each other by telephone with perfect distinctness on the afternoon of January 25.

All that is apparent to the public in the performance of this miracle of science are some 130,000 tall poles stretching over hill and dale, across

THE most sensational feature of the week just past was the naval battle in the North Sea between German and British fleets Sunday morning, January 24. Unfortunately the details of the fight are not altogether clear, but as far as information is certain the story of the battle is as follows:

Early in the morning, about 7.30, a British patroling squadron, under Admiral Beatty, sighted a German fleet apparently destined for the English coast. On sighting the British, the German ships turned back, but were pursued and a hot running fight ensued, which resulted in the Blücher sinking, the rest of the German ships making their escape.

The Blücher was an armored cruiser of 15,000 tons, laid down in 1896 with an armament of twelve 8.2-inch and eight 6-inch guns, and a speed of 25 knots. She carried a crew of 885, of whom 220-odd were rescued, making a loss of lives about 660.

The British fleet was composed of the Lion, Tiger, Princess Royal, New Zealand and Indomitable, of which the Lion, Tiger and Princess Royal are dreadnought battle cruisers and the other two dreadnoughts. Between them they carried twenty-four 15-inch guns and seventeen 12-inch guns. The German force, consisting of the Derfflinger, Seidlitz and Moltke, two battle cruisers, and the ill-fated Blücher, carried eight 12-inch, twenty 11-inch and twelve 8.2-inch guns as their main armament. The 8.2-inch guns hardly jury, and the Meteor, a new destroyer, was rather badly injured.

In addition, the Germans insist that a British battle cruiser was sunk, and describe the sinking with a wealth of detail, while the British also insist with equal tenacity that the Germans lost a light cruiser, the Kolberg, and that several other units of their fleet were badly damaged, but in neither case are these losses admitted.

Submarines and aircraft participated in this fight, which is the first in the world's history that man has fought simultaneously on the water, beneath the water and in the air.

Germany has had very bad luck with armored cruisers. The Blücher is the fourth she has lost, the Scharnhorst, the Gneisenau and the Yorck being the other three. These losses practically destroy the German strength in this type, as the five she has left are all old, comparatively slow and without heavy armament.

Excluding auxiliary cruisers, which are nothing but merchant ships with a few small guns, repair and other non-combatant units, the battle in the North Sea Sunday makes the score between England and Germany as follows: British destroy twenty-five German warships, with a tonnage of 102,709 and a loss of life of 4,402. Germans destroy nineteen British warships, with a tonnage of 153,700 and a loss of life of 5,643.

Germany had another piece of bad luck on the water. The cruiser Gazelle was, it is reported, torpedoed in the Baltic, but managed to get into a port. The Gazelle is a small and old

ARMAGEDDON

"And he gathered them together in a place called in the Hebrew tongue Armageddon." Rev. 16: 16

A SERMON

Rev. David J. Burrell, D.D.*

IN THE center of Palestine is a beautiful valley, extending from the Jordan to the Mediterranean, which has been likened to "a rolling sea of verdure." Around it the mountains stand like sentinels, and through it the Kishon threads its noisy way. This is the Plain of Megiddo, or Armageddon; known also as Esdraelon, the historic battlefield of Israel. Here Gideon with his three hundred routed the Midianites. Here Barak triumphed over the Canaanites, and Deborah and her daughters raised the song, "O my soul, thou hast trodden down strength!" Here Saul and Jonathan, the "beauty of Israel," were slain upon the high places; and here the good king Josiah met his final defeat and the house of David was brought low.

To this valley John the Evangelist was transported in his vision on Patmos; and before him all the battles of history were gathered into one stupendous conflict, which was destined to close the present order and usher in the Golden Age. He saw seven angels in white linen come forth and pour out seven vials of wrath; on the land, and behold, a pestilence; on the sea, and it was coagulated "like the blood of a dead man"; on the rivers, and they were changed to sanguinary torrents; on the sun, and it became a ball of fire; on the throne of the Beast, and in the gathering night were heard voices of blasphemy; on the Euphrates, and its receding waters sent forth all manner of noisome things; into the air, and there were quakings and thunderings.

Then a trumpet call! And, behold, the opposing armies are marshaled at Armageddon for the last and greatest of the world's battles. The hosts of darkness advance under command of the Dragon and the Beast. The White Troop is led by a majestic Figure arrayed in garments dipped in blood, having upon his vesture and thigh a name written "King of Kings and Lord of Lords." There is a confused clash of arms; and presently, when the smoke clears away, a shout is heard, "Babylon the great is fallen, is fallen!" The Beast is cast into an abyss with a sound of rattling chains; and heaven rings with mighty thunderings, "Alleluia; for the Lord God Omnipotent reigneth!"

Is It the "Last War"?

It is not strange that some interpreters find in this prophetic picture a possible allusion to the outcome of the war now going on. Certain it is that such a conflict has never before been seen. At least one-half of the population of the world is engaged in it. And the forces employed are such as to suggest that there can never be another like it. Are we warranted, therefore, in concluding that it fulfills the conditions of John's vision, in portending the close of the present dispensation and ushering in the kingdom of Christ?

If the pouring out of the seven vials of plagues were all the evidence required we have it. Was Avarice ever so prevalent? Witness the universal scramble of the street. Were the forces of Intemperance ever more defiant? One and a half billions of money per annum are spent in our country alone for strong drink. Was Sensuality ever more shameless? The name of the Beast is writ plain on most of our literature and the drama, and, alas, public sentiment does not discountenance it. Was the Sabbath ever more flagrantly disregarded? Not a few of our legislatures legalize its desecration and many who call themselves Christians are not averse to it. Was the Bible ever more virulently assailed? The malady of our time is bibliophobia. Was Dishonesty ever more fashionable? There are men in canonicals who vie with commercial adventurers in giving the impression that "oaths are but straws." And what about War, the last and worst of the desolations? Harken to the cry from the trenches of Belgium and from the far borders of the East!

Shall we say then that this is the beginning of the end? Who can tell? It is written, "The kingdom of God cometh not with observation," and "If any say 'Lo here' and 'Lo there,' believe him not."

The most we are warranted in saying is that it may be so. There is to be a last war, characterized as "the beginning of sorrows," in which the evil powers of the world shall, like the foul spirits of the demoniac, tear their victim before they come out of him. In this final grapple the fable of the dragon stinging itself to death shall be fulfilled; and the vanishing clouds of Armageddon shall show a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness, with a new heaven above it. Then shall the Tabernacle of God come down among men and he will dwell with them; and they shall be his people, and God himself shall be their God.

A Time of Great Events

Of this we may be sure; some things are passing. The logic of events has made progress an accomplished fact: the world in rolling around has rolled away from some of its ancient horrors and left them forever to the limbo of the past. For this let us be thankful.

We are living, we are dwelling
In a grand and awful time.

One of these foredoomed horrors of the past is barbarism. By this is meant not merely the ignorance and superstition of the "regions lying in darkness and the shadow of death," all of which have been penetrated by the light of civilization; but particularly the barbarities of war. The nations have mutually agreed that the demands of common humanity shall not be disregarded even in battle. The mere rumor of atrocities has stirred the indignation of the world. The army that cries "Vae victis!" is under the ban. The nation that preys upon peaceful commerce, wrongs the innocent or maims the wounded, must reckon with all mankind in these days. The stars in their courses have arrayed themselves against the scythed chariots of Sisera. The nations have for centuries been slowly but surely moving away from inhumanity, even on the thin red line.

Another of the abominations of the past, which the present war is making an end of, is militarism. It is obvious that no nation can henceforth exist on a war footing. Armies and armaments will probably continue so long as self-defense is necessary; but armies and armaments for conquest are doomed. The civilized world has arrived at the conclusion that governments are for the preservation of law and order among the people, not for the maintenance of royal establishments or the aggrandizement of national power by adding Naboth's vineyard to the public domain.

The manifesto of Paul on Mars Hill, "God hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell upon the face of the earth, and hath determined the bounds of their habitation," has at length been incorporated in the international code. The landmarks are set and the borders are placarded "No trespass." The only excuse for militarism is thus disposed of. The only footing for a nation henceforth will be a peace footing. The rising generations will not play with tin soldiers, but be trained in the arts of peace. If this should be the sole outcome of this dreadful conflict it will abundantly pay for all its expenditure of blood and treasure.

The "Larger Patriotism"

Still another of the foredoomed evils is False Patriotism. Far be it from me to decry the love of country. "Lives there a man with soul so dead, who never to himself has said, 'This is my own, my native land?'" But when patriotism is construed to mean either "Our country, right or wrong," or "Our country over all," that is, against its neighbors and the world, then the less of it the better.

When Marshal Bazaine was summoned before a court martial to answer for his cowardly surrender at Metz, all his excuses were met by the question, "But what of France?" There is, however, a larger question than any touching the welfare of France, namely: what of the fellowship of nations and the brotherhood of man? Let us rejoice that the advance of civilization has emphasized the fact that loyalty to one's country is not inconsistent with a just conception of the solidarity of the race. The ancient dream of "putting a girdle round the world" is being realized. Every turnpike, railway and electric cable, every treaty, international congress and exchange of diplomatic courtesy helps bring the ends of the world together and actualize the hope of the Parliament of Man.

One more of the vanishing evils is Erasmianism; that is, the organic union of church and state. It is affirmed with reason that the present war probably not have occurred had the church fused its consent. But how could it be otherwise? The church in every one of the nations comes with a single exception, is under the patronage of the government? Is it not a foregone conclusion that a minister who holds his "living" at thehest of the crown will do what the king requires of him? What can an "established church" bow the pregnant hinges of the knee to that maintains it?

The remedy is indicated in the teaching of Jesus: "Render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and unto God the things that are God's." Where church and state are recognized as co-ordinate but independent organizations the conscience of the former is free from considerations of political expediency; but where the church is dependent on the state for its franchise of prosperity it inevitably treads the path of worldly wisdom and renders unto Cæsar the things that are God's. If disestablishment should follow this war the price, exorbitant as it seems, would not be too great to pay for it.

A Faith-Testing Time

And, finally, the power of Antichrist is being manifested. By Antichrist is meant a denial of the supreme authority of Christ in the affairs of nations and the children of men. (II John 7.)

It is plain to be seen in passing events that the whole civilized world has practically adopted the principles for which the Gospel stands. A war in the trenches of Flanders cannot write a letter without paying tribute to Jesus in the capitalistic letters "A. D." If he be wounded, the ambulance that carries him to the hospital is marked with a Red Cross; and the same symbol is worn by the surgeon and nurses who minister to his need. As all the heavenly bodies move in obedience to a force binding them resistlessly to the center, so has our world been advancing along the lines of so-called civilization in the pathway marked out by Christ, hedged in by two great truths, with the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man.

John Wesley said, "I read the newspapers and see how the kingdom of God is moving on." The comments of the public press on current events and particularly with reference to the war, reveal the fact that the world of the twentieth century has adopted the principles of Christ; and, so far, we are warranted in believing that we are far from the end of the present order of things.

For lo, the days are hastening on
By prophet bards foretold,
When with the ever-circling years
Comes round the age of gold:
When Peace shall over all the earth
Its ancient splendors fling,
And the whole world give back the song
Which now the angels sing.

If this be true, it is the wrong time to ask "Are we losing our faith?" A superficial observer of events may, in view of the lurid scene, conclude that the heavens are falling and the foundations of the great deep breaking up. Faith of that sort, being worth the saving, may easily be lost. But faith is strengthened by conflicting winds. It is "that God is on the field when he is most invisible. It looks beyond the Syrian host and sees, like that, "the mountains are full of the Lord's armies, and chariots."

When next the sun rises in crimson splendor, summon your faith to the vision of Armageddon. See the White Troop advancing to meet the hosts of Gog and Magog to the fray! Hear again the shout that closed the controversy in Carmel: "The Lord is the God!" Read history between the lines that open up like golden gates to let the Kingdom of Glory enter in. For this is the logic of events: The Lord of Sinai, of Carmel, of Olivet, of Calvary, of Megiddo, of all the salient heights of history, is proving himself to be the God.

DAILY MEDITATION

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR. LED BY REVS. J. H. JOWETT, D.D., F. B. MEYER,

The Vicissitudes of Life

MONDAY, February 14. Psalm 36: 5. "Thy faithfulness reacheth even unto the clouds." And is there anything more fickle and changeable than the clouds? The transformation of our outline is continual. If we try to sketch a portrait it is almost gone before our materials are dry. So fleeting is the form that we can watch a swift transition. And yet these ephemeral scenes are here chosen to express the faithfulness of God.

Events are not the creation of caprice. They are shaped by chance temperature, or by lucky and unlucky winds and tempests. In all their fickleness reveal an abiding purpose. In the apparent chaos reigns an established throne. Every transformation obeys a sovereign rule. "His faithfulness reacheth even unto the clouds."

Life too, is full of vicissitudes. Our circumstances are as changeable as the clouds. Everything changes. We are never really "settled"; a radiant circumstance suddenly melts like a fleecy cloud, and another circumstance appears, full of dark menace and frown. "Change and decay in all around I see." And yet the swift and almost fierce transitions are mottogether by an inevitable bond of divine faithfulness. They are more than a chain; they are the highway of grace.

Through all the many coils and complications of our life a rope there runs the unbroken red strand which tokens its genuineness and strength. And through all the complicated web of the believer's circumstances, with their swiftly changing patterns, runs the enduring strand of divine fidelity, the red strand of sacrificial love and care.

In thus our changing lot is the home of the faithful God. One purpose pervades the passages. It links together spring-time and autumn and sunshine and shower. My fragmentary life may be a glorious whole in the unfailing truth and mercy of the eternal God. "O thou who never dost not, abide with me." J. H. J.

Christian Courage Through Trust in God

TUESDAY, February 15. Isaiah 7: 1-16. "If ye will not believe, surely ye shall not be established." A conspiracy was on foot to dismember the kingdom. Panic spread through the land, like the blight of a forest in the wind. Under such circumstances no man can bear himself worthily. The quiet soul reveals itself in vacillation and weakness. The child of God in troublous times must be established. In a time of commercial or national crisis his head must be cool, his hand steady, his heart calm and collected, his decisions reliable. As the wood, shaken with every breeze, is emblem of the religious and believing soul. "He will not be afraid of evil tidings: his heart is established, trusting in the Lord. His heart is established, he will not be afraid" (Psalm 112: 7).

How may we obtain that calm and established trust? The clue is faith—the simple child's trust in the Father's care. He made you, has given you your nature, has cared for you and brought you hitherto, loves you so much that he has given you a name and place in his family—cannot you trust him to care for you and yours?

Why do we worse for you than the wounded soldier in a great battle recently, who, at the end of his life, first drew a dying comrade out of the firing-line, and then went back to give a drink of water to a dying German? Is there more love in human hearts than in the heart of God? Look farther down the chapter; see the name by which God calls himself. Immanuel! God with us! Say it over and over to yourself as you go into the battle! Don't look down at your foes, look into his face—God is with me! F. B. M.

The New Heaven of Today

WEDNESDAY, February 16. II Corinthians 6: 2. "Behold, now is the accepted time; behold, now is the day of salvation." There is no greater fallacy in spiritual interpretation than that which makes Christianity a tactical scheme to escape hell and to get into Paradise, to follow worldly methods in the idea of a sudden reformation later on, to postpone the peace of the soul, the new heaven of the new earth, to another or a future world. Jesus said and taught more truly than this. "The kingdom of God is within you," was his dictum. It is believing, accepting soul the Master's way, as he said to the thief on the cross, "Thou shalt be with me in Paradise!"

the paradise of peace, born of the regulation of our lives to the life of God here and now, in this workaday world.

The new heaven of today! This shall be my motto, my sign of victory. What does God do for me now? This is the test of a religion. "God is a very present help in time of trouble," said the Hebrew singer. Are we making our religion a practice or a theory? Do we look to God first, in every smallest detail, in our everyday life? We are told, over and over again, that God is all-powerful, all-wise and ever-present, for my life today. He means to exhibit his divine power with us this very day. This power God intends to use only for our good. In line with it, in co-partnership with him, our success is certain; nothing seriously harmful can possibly happen to us when we feel that we have this great power with us in our daily task. It would give a business man financial confidence to feel that he had behind him one of the biggest banking houses in the country. The Christian has a right to that confidence, growing out of the belief that he has behind him the limitless source of God's supply of all things, both material and spiritual, necessary for the needs of his children. "Behold, now is the day of salvation." C. S. C.

The Supreme Love that Annihilates Self

WEDNESDAY, February 17. John 3: 16-36. "The friend of the bridegroom." Though he never knew the joy of wedded love, and for the most part lived a lonely and austere life, the Baptist appears to have caught a glimpse of the happiness of marriage festivities. He had seen the joy on the bridegroom's face, and the joy of the bridegroom's friends had not escaped his quick eye, although it was different, and was as moonlight to sunlight, the reflection of the other, the sympathetic joy of a kindred heart. This was his joy. "This my joy is filled to the brim." He looked at things as they affected Jesus, and if He was happy, that was happiness enough for himself.

We may well covet joy like this, because nothing can deprive us of it. We have had joy in our own success, in the advance of our influence, wealth and comfort, or in the prosperity of those akin to us. But in these great words of the Forerunner we catch sight of something nobler far; namely, to look out on all happenings in the world, the church and ourselves, as they concern that great Friend who has called us into this sacred intimacy. We need to love him more than we love ourselves. We need a love which is not content to receive, but yearns to give. We need to love him so much as to be prepared to decrease, if only he may increase. That this is a high level is evident, but it is not inaccessible; and when once we have caught sight of it, we may at least turn our steps in that direction and begin to travel thither. Nothing but a supreme love can annihilate self and make us willing to decrease. Perhaps that love will come most readily as we listen to the Bridegroom's voice! F. B. M.

The Shortest Road to Heart's Peace

THURSDAY, February 18. Psalm 139: 23, 24. "Search me, O God, and know my heart: try me, and know my thoughts: and see if there be any wicked way in me, and lead me in the way everlasting." Some one said that Browning appealed to him more strongly than Tennyson, since Browning seems to speak from the place of one's ordinary daily struggle, while Tennyson's words come down to us from a lofty height of ideal perfection. Certain it is that the Psalms, which in so many cases seem to be spoken out of the depths of personal shortcomings, crying out and confessing the sins and weaknesses of our common humanity, are always contemporary with us. Repeatedly we feel that the psalmist's words represent an honest exposure of our own hearts. He drags out into the light our own faults and numbers them before our very eyes.

It was said that Brutus pointed out, in the robe of the murdered Caesar, the various rents, identifying each rent with the name of the man who smote his friend. The Hebrew writer likewise holds the glass up to our own hearts and it is instinctive and natural to join in his cry, "Search me, O God, and know my heart."

The shortest road to peace is often by the way of confession to God or to man of our mistakes. The man who said, "I never apologize," is a poor example for him who would cultivate a heart at peace.

The approach to the way everlasting is by the route cleared of every personal and besetting sin. The arousal to a new possibility is often first dependent upon clearing our path of the things that have been shutting out the spiritual light. "If ye confess your sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness."

A few years ago I was talking to a student in a Southern college, who was troubled about his Christian life. I gave him this passage in the Psalms. He went out hurriedly and in a few hours returned, but his face had changed. "What did you do?" I asked. He answered, "I wrote a letter to a man whom I had wronged." God had helped him to search himself. The young man had squarely faced his spiritual obstacle. He had taken a step along the way of larger life by getting his past wrongdoing out of his path. He had begun to walk bravely in the way everlasting. C. S. C.

The Ministry of the Saints to Suffering

FRIDAY, February 19. Ephesians 4: 1-16. "For the perfecting (i. e., jointing) of the saints unto the work of the ministry." Every saint is meant to be a minister—a channel through which the healing love of God may flow out to soothe sorrow and cure the open sores of men. "The world is full of griefs and graves." Men accuse God; whereas an enemy hath done this. The malign powers that lie beyond our human ken devise evil, and obtain the use of mortal wills and bodies for the execution of their knavish plottings. But over all is the healing grace of God. The power of the Lord is as present to heal in our time as in any that has preceded it; but it always demands channels and agents through which to pour itself. The saints are intended to become these needed instruments, and they are called to be holy that they may be spiritually aseptic and efficient in such service.

But, alas, too many of us are out of joint! We are in the body of Christ, but, like dislocated limbs, are useless; and before we can fulfill the great ministry which Jesus desires to fulfil by our means, we must be articulated and jointed with the living Head.

He has two great difficulties in carrying out his purposes of mercy. On the one hand, the wounded and dying sons of men do not open their hearts to him in faith; and on the other, his own members need to be put in joint, so that his will and theirs may impinge like the joint of the elbow. To effect this, he commissions pastors and teachers and the like. If they carry out their special function faithfully, he will do the rest! F. B. M.

The Blessed Hour When the Master Calls Us

SATURDAY, February 20. Matthew 25: 34. "Come, ye blessed of my Father." Our Lord is standing where he did when he arose to welcome the first martyr to heaven. He is bending over the upper galleries, saying to us today, "Ye shall receive power, for all power is given unto me. Ye shall be witnesses of me. Ye shall go into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature. Ye shall return with the lost worlds in your arms, bringing your sheaves with you."

Then, when the hour comes to call us home, he will say, "Come, ye blessed of my Father." This will be our name in the heavenly world—"Blessed of my Father!" That's what you are, and that is what you will be. It is not a long name in words; but in meaning it is a forever name. It is a name descriptive of your eternal life. When the hour comes for you to be called by that name, you will not be thinking of death, but you will whisper to yourself, "I will arise and go to my Father, where I shall be blessed forevermore. I will come up higher, for the Master is come and calleth for me." E. W. C.

And with our faith thus buttressed, what follows but to live that way? A soldier returning from battle was asked what he saw. "Nothing but dust and smoke." "And what did you do?" "I stood by my gun." It is for us to stand in our places and promote the advancing cause. The faith that says: "God's in his heaven; all's right with the world" is the secret of a happy and useful life; for only as we believe in the ultimate triumph of truth and goodness can we count it worth while to lend a hand along the way.

Lincoln a Bible Student

ALTHOUGH fifty years have wellnigh passed since the death of Lincoln, the memory of his great career is still cherished by Americans as warmly as ever. Probably in the case of no man in our public life has there been so much posthumous enlightenment. Year by year, the conviction has steadily grown that the greatness of Lincoln, the wondrous power of his public addresses, his official messages and his influence both in public and private life, are largely due to the fact that he was a close and appreciative student of the Bible. It was the source of his noblest inspirations and of those utterances which dignified his speeches all through his public career. A recent biographer said: "I have taken the pains to go through his public work, his speeches, his letters, and many of his public papers, and I have marked every reference to God and to providence, every Scriptural allusion or quotation, and I have been frequently astonished at the result. Some pages are literally covered with pencilings; some single paragraphs contain as many as half a dozen such references. I talked recently with an old man who heard the Lincoln and Douglas debate at Bloomington, Ill., who said: 'I remember Lincoln quoted Scripture like a preacher.'" Browne, one of his biographers, wrote: "He made frequent use of Bible language and of illustrations drawn from Holy Writ. It is said that when he was preparing his Springfield speech of 1858, he spent hours trying to find language to express the central idea. Finally a Bible passage flashed through his mind and he exclaimed, 'A house divided against itself cannot stand.'" (Mark 3: 25.) In his second inaugural he quoted twice from Matthew and once from the Psalms. It would seem that in every crisis of his life he sought Bible inspiration and divine guidance. While he was running for Congress, he declared his religious attitude when, pulling a small Bible from his pocket, he said to a ministerial friend: "If I read this Book aright, every preacher ought to be with me in this contest." His keen memory, together with his logical mind and legal training, made his Bible knowledge readily available. A biographer relates that on one occasion when Lincoln was in Chicago trying a lawsuit, he surprised a group of his friends by giving "a short but succinct account of all the inventions referred to in the Old Testament, from the time when Adam walked in the garden of Eden until the Bible record ended, 600 B.C." The simple truth would seem to be that Abraham Lincoln was a plain Bible Christian, neither sectarian nor denominationalist, but one who took the inspired Word as his guide and who sought to know the divine will. His trust in God and in the patriotism of the common people was his mainstay through life.

Favorite Chapters

TUCKED away among the paragraphs of the Christian Herald Mail Bag Department some weeks ago was the suggestion that readers send in votes, stating their twelve favorite chapters of the Bible. The matter has a timely interest just now, for the topic of two young peoples' societies on February 21 is, "Favorite Chapters and Why?"

If you are reading this editorial page while other members of the family circle are near, get them to lay down their other reading and notice this vote. Ask them what chapter they think heads the list. They will probably all agree, and all be right: the fourteenth of John. Two chapters tied for second place. What were they? You will all be quite sure to guess one of them, the other you may not agree on. I Corinthians 13 and Romans 8. The chapter having fourth place, many of you would perhaps have put in second or third. It is the "Shepherd Psalm," the wonderful 23d. Hebrews 11, the faith chapter, came next; and for the next place the vote is a tie again: Isaiah 53 and Psalm 103. That is a beautiful combination; the sufferings of Jesus and the Psalm of Praise. For next place three chapters have a tie vote: John 17, the high-priestly prayer; I Corinthians 15, the resurrection chapter, and Isaiah 55, the loving invitation to thirsty souls. This makes ten chapters. For eleventh and twelfth places five chapters received a tie vote, so the twelve favorite chapters cannot be accurately stated. These were Matthew 5, Romans 12, Psalms 19, 91 and 121.

The dear old Book! How would we live without it? It is indeed light, food, water, strength, joy.

But while knowing and loving the Book as a whole it is good to have these places of particular delight. Their words are indelibly written upon brain and soul; they bring us our clearest views of Christ; they lift our burdens; they solve our problems; they heal our sorrows. They conquer sin for us; they fill life with music; they show heaven's gate standing open.

100,000,000 Souls!

HAVE we or have we not passed the 100,000,000 mark in population? This event is of such transcendent interest, not to say importance, that one is naturally surprised to learn that there should be any difference of opinion among our authorities on the subject. Yet there is such a difference. On the one hand, the Census Bureau assures us that on April 2 we shall be exactly 100,000,000 strong; while on the other, the actuary of the Treasury Department affirms that we have already passed the mark in the closing days of January, and that we began the present month with a population of 16,000 in excess of the 100,000,000. In either case, the great event is here. It is not unlikely that after the present war we may have a new influx from some quarter of the old world but little represented hitherto in our polyglot population. Uncle Sam is to be congratulated. He has the biggest metropolis in the world and one of the largest families on the globe; he is at peace with everybody and his influence is unimpaired and steadily extending. It is a tremendous responsibility to govern such a vast household, and those who are at the head of affairs need to take counsel daily of the Divine wisdom to direct them in their work.

One Kind of Diplomacy

IT IS a rather unusual condition of affairs that has been disclosed during the investigation in New York City in the case of the Hon. James Mark Sullivan, United States minister to the Dominican Republic. Mr. Sullivan, who was appointed by Mr. Bryan, secretary of state, is under charges, to investigate which the President assigned United States Senator-elect James D. Phelan of California, who seems to be making a very thorough job of it. Some of the charges have reference to Minister Sullivan's lack of official dignity and his preference for negligée costume. Some of the witnesses, however, testified that, as the climate was "a hot one, where most people wear as little as they may," while they might not consider Mr. Sullivan an ideal diplomat, he was a good man for "that kind of a country." One of the witnesses, John G. Gray, of Delaware, a friend of Secretary Bryan, had recommended Mr. Sullivan for the Dominican post, and, according to the account in the New York Times, to show Mr. Sullivan's "high purpose in office" he submitted a personal letter from the latter, dated January 31, 1914, which Minister Sullivan asked him to show to Secretary Bryan. It is this letter which is of special interest at the present time. After lauding Santo Domingo as the "richest and fairest land in the whole universe" the writer proceeds:

The trouble with the Dominican Republic is that many of the people are unmoral. Religion, in the form of the Catholic Church, which is practically the only moral influence, receives no assistance from without and, constantly assailed from within, is unable to cope with the savage, brutal tendencies of semi-civilization. If this country is to live the Catholic Church here must have its arms strengthened.

The letter then refers to the attacks made by various Dominican administrations on the Catholic Church, and continues:

The United States Government should do everything in its power to remedy the wrong inflicted by the irresponsible governments here, and to utilize the church to reclaim the country and the people. The men of this generation are hopeless, but I would have the youth taught the tenets of Christianity, and the true meaning of patriotism. It would be mighty good politics, John, as well as a glorious philanthropy.

I need not tell you how well the Republicans "collected" on their friendship to Catholic interests in the Philippines and Cuba. They had to deal with a Protestant antagonism, but I believe it was settled by that experience that it was idle to confuse those people that had some idea of Catholicism by the introduction of doctrinal controversies. I am sure this is Mr. Bryan's opinion also.

In the same letter, the writer says:

I have convinced the old archbishop that he must lay aside his pride and let the Christians of America become aware of the situation. I have told him that Mr. Bryan asked Christianity, and that he was glad I was a Catholic.

I believe it is our duty to see that the archbishop belongs to him and that in doing our duty we would harm to ourselves, when the archbishop would tell Gibney, O'Connell, and all the others how kind Mr. Bryan had been to the church.

Mr. Gray during his testimony admitted that he had been asked to recommend Sullivan by the American Society of Wilmington, Del. Mr. Sullivan had ambitions to be an assistant district attorney in New York, according to Mr. Gray's statement, he knew that was hopeless, and so he would have some kind of an appointment. "Then," Mr. Gray, "I heard he was a candidate for the post, and my Irish friends asked me to recommend him. I told Mr. Bryan that Mr. Sullivan was always ready and willing to come to Del. campaign orator. This is the only time I asked a favor from Mr. Bryan."

If this were on a par with the other appointments of Secretary Bryan, it would indeed be astounding; but, even as an isolated case, something in it that requires explanation was such a candidate appointed at all? question of fitness, or was it for the sal political advantage? Did Secretary of State see the letter that Minister Sullivan wrote and if he did, what action was taken to such a political muddle as seems to have in consequence? Mr. Sullivan may be a very good Catholic and a very clever politician; but the liberty of seriously questioning the wisdom of putting a Catholic propagandist, clothed with the official powers of a United States minister, where. Any political advantage obtained such an appointment would be paid for at a price.

The American people will look with a great deal of interest for Senator Phelan's report to the President on this latest instance of the mercenary mingling of religion and politics. Of late years we have seen this evil illustrated in several states, with the most deplorable results. It should be rigorously stamped out of the diplomatic service, which must be free from the ugly stain of propagandism at every cost.

A Federal Employment Bureau

SECRETARY OF LABOR WILSON announced that a system of bringing workers together has been put into effect by his department. This is in line with a suggestion recently made by the President in his Indianapolis speech, that the government effort to keep the unemployed acquainted with openings for work in various parts of the country. The present plan is "for the purpose, on the one hand, of developing the welfare of the earners of the United States and improving opportunities for profitable employment, on the other hand, of affording to employers a means whereby they may make application for such help as they need, either male or female, citizen or alien residents, and have their wants applied through said distribution branches. No employer or employee for this service. The Post Office Department and the Department of Agriculture are co-operating with the Department of Labor in this work. The plan provides for placing in every post office in the United States a set of blanks of the Division of Information so that persons seeking employment and employers in need of help may apply at their local postoffice for the appropriate blanks on which to make application.

This is a long step in the right direction. It is in line with ex-President Roosevelt's remark about the unemployed in his recent New York lecture given for their relief. "They want loans and not alms," he said; "work and not gifts." Mr. Roosevelt also took advanced ground in expressing his conviction that persons who are unemployed because of diseases and ill-living conditions by poverty, should be taken care of by the government until their health is restored. "Men will not work should be compelled to do so," he declared, and stated that municipal far asylums are required to look after those who are only to be set upon their feet.

Both the ex-President and the Administration are to be congratulated upon their efforts for the relief of the present unfortunate situation. It is earnestly hoped that before another winter comes the public opinion and effort will have greatly lessened the distress and grief caused by the unemployment of those eager to work.

Carnegie Hero Medals Awarded

THE annual meeting of the Carnegie Hero Fund Commission on January 20 forty-four instances of bravery were rewarded. Silver medals were given to eleven and bronze medals to thirty-three persons. Thirteen heroes who were entitled to recognition lost their lives, and the dependents pensions aggregating $3,900 are granted; while to the dependents of four persons who lost their lives sums totaling $3,000 are appropriated. In addition to these money awards in eight cases sums aggregating $14,000 are appropriated for educational purposes, payments to be made as needed and approved; and in thirteen cases, awards aggregating $21,615 are made, to be applied toward the purchase of the liquidation of indebtedness and to other purposes. The report of the commission lists the names and the acts of the heroes who gave their own lives to save others. Among the stories told is that of the bravery of Harry T. Dick, a plumber. Emil Dick fell from a catboat into Great South Bay, half a mile from the shore. He could not swim and was drowning. Dick was a fine swimmer, jumped in to rescue about the latter grabbed Dick in such a way that he was helpless, and both men were drowned. The commission awarded Dick's widow a silver medal and $40 a month. The hope of a reward did not enter into heroism; another would instantly forget the virtue of the act. It is a beautiful thing for a man to recognize and reward deeds of self-sacrifice, to provide for the widows and children of the brave who gave up their lives for others. Such instances do not forget the little people who live for themselves, but our eyes to a loftier view of manhood, and to his whose spirit of love we have caught, and whose me of sacrifice they have seen. "Hereby perceive we the love of God, because he laid down his life for us: and ought to lay down our lives for the brethren." (1 John 3:16.)

Wild Christ Fortune

The decision of a jury in Detroit the other day, the $100,000 accumulated by Gustav Von der Heide in a lifetime at his trade as a lottery was left as the old man intended it—to aid the second coming of Christ. Witnesses said that the man took a literal meaning from the sale of the talents. They said he looked on his life as an evidence that he had been a "good faithful servant," and that some time he would be called to account for his stewardship of the money. Mere hoarding is not service. This man hid his talent in a napkin, but employed it in useful trading, leaving it with its present increase and future accretion to await his Lord's return. Time, talent, opportunity, wealth, life are moments bestowed by our Lord, and for which we will call us to strict account. In making his will, the shoemaker seemed to have had in mind the verse containing this verse: "Blessed is that man who shall find the Lord when he cometh shall find him." (Matt. 24:46.)

Medicinal Trees Fast Disappearing

The woodman's ax has been clearing our forests so rapidly as to work great injury to the farming interests of the country and to the wealth of the nation. The trees so necessary to the retention of moisture for the soil and a supply for the rivers have been ruthlessly cut down. The trees from which medicines are derived are rapidly disappearing with the rest. The wild cherry, besides having the ax as an enemy, has been cut down by the tiny teeth of insects. Its bark contains hydrocyanic acid, and is a popular tonic. The witch-hazel, known as a remedy by the Indians, is being destroyed. The bark of the slippery elm tree is wonderfully healing to wounds and inflammations. The butternut as a mild cathartic, the white ash as an astringent, the white pine and spruce for the respiratory organs, the tamarack, the white willow and the birch as tonics, and other trees with health-giving properties are rapidly fading away. Nature is beneficent and sets herself to the task of curing her own wounds. In the earth there are minerals, and in the gardens, fields and groves there are chemicals for the healing of the diseases of the people. In the spiritual realm there is a remedy ready for the healing of every moral malady, a cure for the deadly diseases of sin. That cure is the love of God expressed in the blood of his crucified Son. "And Jesus said unto him, I will come and heal him." (Matt. 8:7.)

FORCIBLY FEEDING MONSTER SNAKE

A VERY large and valuable snake in the Lincoln Park Zoo, Chicago, had lain dormant and had not taken food for several months. The fast had seriously injured the reptile, reducing its weight from 300 to 200 pounds, and threatening the destruction of its life. The keeper of the animals at Lincoln Park took a machine looking like a gatling gun, invented for the purpose, and forced food down the throat of the monster serpent twenty-six feet long. Snakes as a rule are flesh-eating. Some species are very fond of milk and eggs. They swallow their food whole. The large ones take live rabbits and birds, and other creatures, and, covering them with saliva, swallow them. After such a meal they show great contentment, and often lie dormant for some time. Everything that lives feeds, and when it stops feeding it pines away and dies. This is true of man's body, mind and soul. The love of God in Christ is the food of the soul, without which it dies. That love cannot be forced into the human heart as food was shot down into the throat of the snake in the park; it can only be done by willingly eating the bread and drinking the water of life. The perishing condition of the serpent illustrates the death by starvation of a human soul without Christ as the food thus expressed:

"And I perish with hunger." (Luke 15:17.)

Bear and Eskimo Boy

WHILE his father was out fishing off Boster Rock, Labrador, Ashwatuk, a sixteen-year-old Eskimo boy, was at home with his mother. A polar bear suddenly thrust his head in the igloo. The brave boy ran and commenced kicking the brute, who caught the boy's foot and bit it off. The bear was driven away, and the lad's mother, for whom he was fighting, was saved. First, the physicians of Dr. Grenfell's mission took an interest in the lad and cared for him in the hospital. Then Martha Leininger, a nurse, decided to get a job for him in her home town in Pennsylvania, and he was sent to New York on the steamship Stephano. The immigration officers decided that, even with the wooden foot the Grenfell people had given him, he might become a public charge if allowed to land, and sent him to Ellis Island. There a special board of inquiry ordered Ashwatuk deported. The boy, who did not utter a scream when the bear undertook to enter the hut, or cry when his foot was bitten off, wept when told he could not remain in this land of privilege which had been described to him. Friends interested themselves, and the case was appealed. Word came back from Washington that the Department of Commerce officials had reversed the order, and would permit the lad to land under a bond to insure his not becoming a public charge. Ashwatuk, after seeing the city, went to the farm of the father of Miss Leininger of the Grenfell Mission at Mo-honton, Pa., which he expects to make his home. It is difficult to tell which most to admire, the superb bravery of the Eskimo boy, or the devotion of the Christian nurse and missionary; both are beautiful illustrations and inspirations of what is best in the human heart. The ministry to the limb as well as soul of the boy in the frozen North was in the name of him who said: "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me." (Matt. 25:40.)

New Potash Deposits Discovered

POTASH deposits have recently been discovered at Searles Lake in Death Valley, Calif. Covering twenty square miles, seventy-five feet deep, it is thought that they will yield for a quarter of a century to the United States as much as we have regularly imported from Germany. It will be sent as a fertilizer to all parts of the country, to be scattered over the farms to feed corn and root crops. With the Searles Lake mine are mingled some valuable salts. Among them is ammonia sulphate. Some of the product of this potash mine will be stirred into crucibles with sand and lead, and there, after the mass has been melted in the furnace, will be blown or pressed or cut into table ware or optical glasses. Some of it will be ground into gunpowder, some will be used in photography and in many of the useful arts. This discovery is but another revelation of the marvelous riches with which God has endowed our land, and leads us to say with the psalmist: "He hath not dealt so with any nation." (Ps. 147:20.)

Policeman 49 Years

JAMES T. GRANT, a policeman, who enjoys the distinction of having been longer in the service than any other officer of New York City, was retired the other day, after having served forty-nine years as a patrolman. He will be seventy years old on April 4. Grant in 1866 joined the Metropolitan police force, which then took in New York, Brooklyn, Staten Island and Yonkers. When Brooklyn broke away from New York in 1870, Grant stayed in Brooklyn, and upon consolidation in 1898 returned to the Manhattan side of the river. This veteran has seen nearly a half-century of strenuous, intelligent, brave and loyal service in the protection of the property and lives of the citizens. The public cannot too highly appreciate the splendid men of the police and fire departments, who take their lives in their hands every time they leave their homes, and do it with a zest and joy. To this veteran one may repeat the Master's words to those having improved their opportunities: "Well done, good and faithful servant!" (Matt. 25:23.)

Curtiss Loses Hydroaero Patent

THE Board of Examiners of the Patent Office decided that the man who made the hydro-aeroplane possible was not Glenn H. Curtiss, but Albert S. Janin, a poor cabinetmaker of Staten Island. Janin claimed that a year before Curtiss made the first attempt to rise from the water on Lake Keuka in his aeroplane and failed, he had perfected a water device that was successful, but which he did not put on the market for lack of money, and the patent office authorities sustained his claim. This decision, it is thought, will make the poor cabinetmaker a very wealthy man, as whoever shall make a machine embodying his idea will have to pay him a royalty. The spirit of inquiry, the parent of discovery, is thus mentioned: "The Athenians spent their time in . . . either to tell or to hear some new thing." (Acts 17:21.)

cruiser and there appears to have been no loss of life. The Frederick Karl, however, a cruiser which the Russians reported two months ago that they had sunk, was seen afloat and apparently in good condition during the week.

Reports come from Libau—that a German Zeppelin, which attacked that town Sunday, was destroyed and its passengers captured. Libau is a city on the Baltic in the so-called German provinces of Russia, and was, it will be remembered, attacked by a German fleet quite early in the war, then suffering some damage.

Another important event of the week was the actual beginning of operations against the Suez Canal and Egypt. This news was contained in the official despatch from Cairo, Egypt, wherein we were advised that what is apparently the advance guard of the Turkish army destined for the invasion of Egypt has taken contact with the defending forces a little to the east of El Kantara on the Suez Canal. An earlier despatch informed us that there was great animation among the British forces guarding the canal, and that troops were being assembled, warships taking up their assigned position, and that all civilians were being removed from the district bordering the canal, but it was a little bit of a surprise to learn that hostilities had actually opened.

These hostilities were in themselves a mere skirmish, but their importance lies in the fact that they show that the army of invasion has actually left its base at Kalat-el-Arish, and from the fact of this attack may be assumed the crossing of the desert of Et Tih, which many people imagined would prove an obstacle very difficult to conquer. From other sources we are informed that the strength of this army is three corps (120,000 men) and that Djemal Pasha is in command.

This army is advancing in two divisions, the one toward El Kantara by the caravan route, which skirts the Mediterranean, and the other by the more easterly route, which leads to both Ismailia and Suez. The bulk of the army is probably on the first-mentioned route.

What forces Great Britain has in Egypt to oppose the Turkish army is not precisely known. In ordinary circumstances she maintained an army of occupation of 6,000 regular troops, which were reinforced by a native army, raised by conscription, amounting to about 17,000 men, most of the higher officers being British. The regular troops were withdrawn at the outbreak of the war for use in Europe, and their places taken by an uncertain number of British territorials and Australian troops. Some comparatively few native Indian troops are also stated to have been sent here.

As for the native army, that will probably, with some possible individual exceptions, remain loyal to Great Britain. The native population, however, is more doubtful in its attitude. A few days ago Great Britain deposed the Khedive of Egypt and installed another member of his family in his place, and how this will be viewed by the Egyptians when the opportunity for free and uncontrolled expression of opinion arises, known. The premier of the Netherlands on Jan made a very important announcement in the house of the Dutch Parliament. "We must, under the colors, our entire army, for moment incidents are possible which may necessary for us to make an appeal to arms."

It was a surprise to learn on Wednesday that Upington, in Bechuanaland, South only a mile or two from the northern border Cape Colony, had been attacked by a large of men under Colonel Maritz, and that severing had there taken place and was continuing.

Concerning the efforts of the Austrians in and Bukowina, against the Russians in Bul the Russians have lost control of the passes through the Carpathians from that duch Transylvania and Hungary. In Galicia the have also suffered important defeats. The fighting Tarnow has been favorable to the Austrians and the Russians have evacuated that important town, retreating to the eastward, and a like result attended the fighting farther south at Tuch and Grybow, with the result of this combination related victories that the control of the Biala has again passed into Austrian hands. To intents and purposes the siege of Przemysl has been abandoned by the Russians.

The principal interest of the campaign in during the week last past has centered in the struggle which has been going on for the possession of the towns of Opoczno, Kousk and Kielce. The first and last of these places were captured before last by the Germans, but the Russians a rally and succeeded in retaking them. The Germans re-attacked in their turn and after some the fiercest fighting of the campaign succeeded in driving the Russians out. In the last three days advance of a few miles to the eastward towards the Vistula has been made by the Teutonic forces. No Opoczno there has also been some severe fighting to the east of Warsaw and Skiermiewice, and the Germans have arrived at about twenty miles from Warsaw. Progress on this front is now very slow, as the Russians have to be driven back trench by trench.

On the northern side of the Vistula the Russian offensive against seems at this writing to be stationary and apparently not being vigorously followed up. In East Prussia, the neighborhood of Gumbinnen, there has been considerable fighting. The Russians are trying to break through here and attack Königsberg. The whole East Prussian, Polish, Galician and Bukowinian campaign (really it is only one campaign rapidly drawing to the stage which something must crack.

London reports that the Bank of England has loaned $25,000,000

Bar of Rumania on the security of Rumania treasury bills. The amount is large enough for a war treasury, for Rumania. There is just a possibility that this advance is a part of the Rumanian railway loan of 1913, 100,000,000, a large part of which is expected to be taken in Great Britain. The Rumanian Parliament met January 28, and perhaps as a result of this meeting we shall have a definite knowledge as to Rumania's future course of action. The Russo-Turkish campaign has now languished during the week; the sides seem to have maintained their positions. The Russians are still in the Transcaucasian Russian territory, and are active in Persia. The allied bombardment of the Dardanelles has as yet produced no result of importance.

The yarn about the German gun which shoots twenty-eight miles has been revived. This was first trotted out some three months ago, and, not taking any too well, was put in retirement. Now, seeming like the sea serpent to have regular seasons of activity, the story is put forth once more. On the western battle line there has been very little, almost no, change during the week. On the extreme western end near the sea the Germans bombarded St. Georges during the week so fiercely that the Allies were forced to withdraw. Passchendaele, between Roulers and Ypres, was also abandoned. Near La Bassee, the key of Lille, was the scene of a fierce struggle, with an indecisive result.

cross-country chat. It is estimated that it will require about ten minutes to connect the two terminal stations. Our outline map shows the way-stations on this great system. The historic dates in the development of means of communication now include: 1756, when the first mail coach ran between New York and Philadelphia; 1807, when Fulton's Clermont sailed up the Hudson; 1844, when Morse sent the first telegraph message from Washington to Baltimore—"What hath God wrought?" 1858, completion of first Atlantic cable; 1869, completion of first transcontinental railway line, Union Pacific; 1876, first telephone line between two cities; 1896, Marconi's first long-distance wireless message; 1915, first transcontinental telephone conversation.

her ancient hope of gaining as a war trophy Constantinople? This has been the desire and ambition of Russia for many years, and to all appearances she will gain what she wishes. In the latter part we read that the king of the north (Turkey) "shall come to his end, and none shall help him." Deserted by those with whom she is now allied, Turkey will be no more, her people driven out. Taking into consideration the fact that originally the Bible was not divided into chapters, we see that these passages indicate one of the greatest events the world has ever known: Christ's second coming (Daniel 12: 1). We do not know how long it may be before this event will take place. After the last event in the long line of prophecy contained in Daniel the space between is spanned simply by the words, "And at that time." Nor can we say that we hope that the world will improve or that this horrible war will be the last and that peace will follow in its wake, for "At that time (when the Turk goes) shall Michael stand up . . . and there shall be a time of trouble such as never was since there was a nation, even to that same time." That does not sound like peace; for just what the majority of people are saying now, "Peace, peace," is certainly a direct fulfilment of I Thess. 5: 3: "When they shall say, Peace and safety, then sudden destruction cometh upon them, and they shall in no wise escape."

TURKEY AND PROPHECY

MY ATTENTION has been called to an article in your issue of November 18, entitled, "Turkey and Prophecy." We read in Daniel 11: 3, 4: "The mighty king shall stand up, and shall rule with great dominion, according to his will. And when he shall stand up, his kingdom shall be enlarged, and shall be divided toward the four winds of heaven; and not many days shall he stand." Now, let us take a simple historical fact: It is known that when Alexander the Great, who ruled a kingdom extending from India to Greece, was in the zenith of his power, he was suddenly cut off. All of his posterity perished. For most powerful generals redivided the four parts into which his empire was divided. Rawlinson, in Six Monarchies, says: "A quadripartite division of Alexander's kingdom was recognized. Macedonia (north), Egypt (south), Asia Minor (east), and Syria (extending eastward beyond the Euphrates)." In verse 5 of the same chapter we read: "And the king of the south shall stand up, and one of his princes; and he shall be strong above him, and have dominion; his dominion shall be a great dominion." Briefly, Seleucus, king of Syria, conquered most of Asia and Thrace, just beyond the boundary of Turkey. Thus Turkey became king of the north. Verses that follow are an account of the conquests between the king of the north and the king of the south. We must pass over the intervening years and come to the place where we find the "king of the north," here in the "time of the end." The emperor identified as the king of the north must occupy the same territory as the king in the preceding century, the region that stretched from Constantinople to the Euphrates. Turkey occupies this exact region. In verses 44 and 45, we find that the king will come to this king in the north. Naturally, that is Russia. We can see this prophecy fulfilled today before our very eyes. Is not Russia already voicing

We are surely approaching the time when the hope of the ages shall be fulfilled. May we not be lulled to sleep by the preparations for peace after the war is over, but rather awakened by the Word of God into activity and watchfulness, for "the day of the Lord cometh as a thief in the night."

A BLESSING TO THE WORLD
I am sure I cannot vote against any department of the Christian Herald. It is so good it would be hard to decide what I like best. So I would say let it remain as it is and let it be in the future what it has been in the past, a blessing to the world. I hope I shall never be without it, for I should miss it as I would a tree. (Here's The Answer)

"What soup shall I have?"

That is the puzzling question!
Are you planning an elaborate function? Or is it one of those semi-formal "little" dinners, or luncheons which help to make the social world go round?
In any case "Campbell's Tomato Soup" may well be the wise and easy answer.

Prepare it either as a light tomato bouillon or as a rich cream-of-tomato; or serve it in bouillon-cups topped with whipped cream—for a specially attractive feature.
It is readily adapted to any meal, moderate or hearty. And its rich distinctive quality commends it to the most epicurean taste.

WE VERILY BELIEVE THAT statement—else the Reo Motor Car Company would never have signed its name to it.

WE REALIZE that it is a very broad statement—and that there is much room for honest difference of opinion among engineers on this point.

BUT REO ENGINEERS MAINTAIN that in the Three-unit chassis Motor, transmission and rear axle each a separate unit—we have obtained the highest degree of accessibility.

ANY ADJUSTMENT or repair may be made to any unit without disturbing any other. The value of this, in dollars—not to mention time—to the owner, cannot be over-estimated.

IT WOULD BE SIMPLER—cheaper—for us from a purely manufacturing standpoint, to incorporate the transmission in the Motor or the rear axle. In a kind of annex, so to speak.

BUT IT WOULD BE less accessible and therefore more expensive to the user. If you have owned cars you appreciate that fact. Ask your friends who do.

IN ADHERING, AS WE HAVE, so tenaciously, to this principle we had in mind the fact that a satisfied user is the best advertisement.

NOT EVERY BUYER appreciates this when buying a car. The Reo owner does sooner or later. So the slight difference in price for of course it does cost more—of the 3-unit chassis motor made up to us in the selling value—when a Reo owner prospective buyer of the low maintenance cost of his car.

A CERTAIN REO DEALER—one who also handles other makes of car of much higher price—was recently asked why his repair shop was always full of the high-priced cars while the Reo shop was so seldom seen there—though he sells so many more Reos.

CHAPTER XIV

JIMMY AND THE GREEN-EYED MONSTER

THIS time Beldingsville did not welcome Pollyanna home with brass bands and bunting—perhaps because the hour of her arrival was known to but few of the townspeople. But there certainly was no lack of joyful greetings on the part of everybody from the moment she stepped from the railway train with her Aunt Polly and Dr. Chilton. Nor did Pollyanna lose any time in starting on a round of fly-away minute calls on all her old friends. Indeed, for the next few days, according to Nancy, "There wasn't no putting of your finger on her anywheres, for by the time you'd get your finger down she wan't there."

And always, everywhere she went, Pollyanna met the question: "Well, how did you like Boston?" Perhaps to no one did she answer this more fully than she did to Mr. Pendleton. As was usually the case when this question was put to her, she began her reply with a troubled frown.

"Oh, I liked it—I just loved it—some of it."

"But not all of it?" smiled Mr. Pendleton.

"No. There's parts of it—Oh, I was glad to be there," she explained hastily. "I had a perfectly lovely time, and lots of things were so queer and different, you know—like eating dinner at night instead of at noon, when you ought to eat it. But everybody was good to me, and I saw such a lot of wonderful things—Bunker Hill, and the Public Garden, and the Seeing Boston Autos, and miles of pictures and statues and store-windows and streets that didn't have any end. And folks. I never saw such a lot of folks."

"Well, I'm sure—I thought you liked folks," commented the man.

"I do." Pollyanna frowned again and pondered. "But what's the use of such a lot of them if you don't know 'em? And Mrs. Carew wouldn't let me. She didn't know 'em herself. She said folks didn't, down there."

There was a slight pause, then, with a sigh, Pollyanna resumed.

"I reckon maybe that's the part I don't like the most—that folks don't know each other. It would be such a lot nicer if they did! Why, just think, Mr. Pendleton, there are lots of folks that live on dirty, narrow streets, and don't even have beans and fishballs to eat, nor things even as good as missionary barrels to wear. Then there are other folks—Mrs. Carew, and a whole lot like her—that live in perfectly beautiful houses, and have more things to eat and wear than they know what to do with. Now, if those folks only knew the other folks—" But Mr. Pendleton interrupted with a laugh.

"My dear child, did it ever occur to you that these people don't care to know each other?" he asked quizzically.

"Oh, but some of them do," maintained Pollyanna, in eager defense. "Now, there's Sadie Dean—she sells bows, lovely bows in a big store—she wants to know people; and I introduced her to Mrs. Carew, and we had her up to the house, and we had Jamie and lots of others there, too; and she was so glad to know them! And that's what made me think that if only a lot of Mrs. Carew's kind could know the other kind—but of course I couldn't do the introducing. I didn't know many of them myself, anyway. But if they could know each other, so that the rich people could give the poor people part of their money—" But again Mr. Pendleton interrupted with a laugh.

"Oh, Pollyanna, Pollyanna," he chuckled; "I'm afraid you're getting into pretty deep water. You'll be a rabid little Socialist before you know it."

"A—what?" questioned the little girl, dubiously. "I—I don't think I know what a Socialist is. But I know what being sociable is—and I like folks that are that. If it's anything like that, I don't mind being one, a mite. I'd like to be one."

"I don't doubt it, Pollyanna," smiled the man. "But when it comes to this scheme of yours for the wholesale dis-don't understand it, all the same."

"No, dear, I'm afraid you don't," agreed the man, growing suddenly very grave and tender-eyed; "nor any of the rest of us, for that matter. But tell me," he added, after a minute, "who is this Jamie you've been talking so much about since you came?"

And Pollyanna told him.

In talking of Jamie Pollyanna lost her worried, baffled look. Pollyanna loved to talk of Jamie. Here was Pendleton. And I mean that I think, from your talk, that wasn't anybody down to Boston just that loony boy who calls birds and squirrels 'Lady Lan' and all that tommyrot."

"Why, Jimmy Be—Pendleton!" gasped Pollyanna. Then, with spirit, "Jamie isn't loony! He's a very nice boy. And he knows a lot of books and stories! Why, he can tell stories right out of his own head. Besides, it isn't 'Lady Lancelot' or 'Sir Lancelot.' If you knew him as much as he does you'd know that," she finished with flashing eyes.

Jimmy Pendleton flushed miserably and looked utterly wretched. Growing more and more jealous moment by moment, doggedly he held his ground. "Well, anyhow," he scoffed, "I don't think much of his name. 'Jamie'! Humph!—sounds sissy! And I know somebody else that said so, too."

"Who was it?"

There was no answer.

"Who was it?" demanded Pollyanna, more peremptorily.

"Dad." The boy's face was sullen.

"Your—dad?" repeated Pollyanna, in amazement. "Why, how could he know Jamie?"

"He didn't. 'Twasn't about Jamie. 'Twas about me." The boy still spoke sullenly, with his eyes turned away. Yet there was a softness in his voice that was a noticeable whenever he spoke of his father.

"You!"

"Yes. 'Twas just a little while before he died. We stopped 'm a week with a farmer. Dad helped put the hayin'—and I did, too, some. The farmer's wife was awful good to me, and pretty quick she was calling me 'Jamie.' I don't know why, but she just did. And one day father and her. He got awful mad—so mad that I remembered it always—what he said. He said 'Jamie' wasn't no sort of a name for a boy, and that reason of his should ever be called it. He said 'twas a sissy name, and he hated it. Seems so I never saw him again as he was that night. He wouldn't even stay to finish the work; but him and me took to the road again that night. I was kind of sorry, 'cause I liked her—the farmer's wife, I mean. She was good to me."

Pollyanna nodded, all sympathy and interest. It was not often that Jimmy said much of that mysterious part of his life, before she had known him.

"And what happened next?" she prompted. Pollyanna had, for a moment, forgotten all about the original subject of the controversy—the "me" "Jamie" that was dubbed "sissy."

The boy sighed.

"We just went on till we found another place. And 'twas there I died. Then they put me in the 'sylum.'"

"And then you ran away, and I found you that day, down by Mrs. Snow's," exulted Pollyanna, slyly. "And I've known you ever since."

"Oh, yes—and you've known me ever since," repeated Jimmy—but in a far different voice. Jimmy had suddenly come back to the present, and to his grievance. "But, then, I don't 'Jamie,' you know," he finished with scornful emphasis, as he turned away, leaving a distressed, bewildered Pollyanna behind him.

"Well, anyway, I can be glad he doesn't always act like this," she shed the little girl, as she mournfully watched the sturdy, boyish figure with its disagreeable, amazing swag.

CHAPTER XV

AUNT POLLY TAKES ALARM

POLLYANNA had been at me about a week when the letter from Della Wetherby came to Mrs. Chilton.

An Old Valentine

by Margaret E. Sangster Jr.

I WANDERED to an attic where lacy cobwebs swayed,
Where sunbeams, dusty golden, were dancing as they strayed;

And as I crossed the threshold with footsteps soft and slow,
I felt the hidden presence of ghosts of long ago.

I saw a wooden chest there with rusty lock and key,
And when I knelt before it my dreaming eyes could see Initials twined together and carving almost hid
By scratches, deeply graven upon the polished lid.

I knelt beside it, silent, and opened it with care;
I felt as if some girl-soul were standing by me there;
For dainty garments whispered, and perfumed laces sung
Of morning and of springtime, when all the world was young.

I saw a folded paper, all yellow with the years.
Perhaps the print of kisses, perhaps the mark of tears
Had touched it once—for, fastened with bow of faded blue,
It whispered through the ages a message, "I love you!"

I laid it gently from me and closed the chest with care,
And breathing through the stillness I heard behind me there
A murmur—half a love word, and half, perhaps, a sigh—
The phantom of a heart-beat of many years gone by.

tribution of wealth—you've got a problem on your hands that you might have difficulty with."

Pollyanna drew a long sigh.

"I know," she nodded. "That's the way Mrs. Carew talked. She says I don't understand; that 'twould—er—pauperize her and be indiscriminate and pernicious, and—well, it was something like that, anyway," bridled the little girl, aggrievedly, as the man began to laugh. "And, anyway, I don't understand why some folks should have such a lot, and other folks shouldn't have anything; and I don't like it. And if I ever have a lot I shall just give some of it to folks who don't have any, even if it does make me pauperized and pernicious, and—" But Mr. Pendleton was laughing so hard now that Pollyanna, after a moment's struggle, surrendered and laughed with him.

"Well, anyway," she reiterated, when she had caught her breath, "I something she understood. Here was no problem that had to deal with big, fearsome-sounding words. Besides, in this particular instance—would not Mr. Pendleton be especially interested in Mrs. Carew's taking the boy into her home, for who better than himself could understand the need of a child's presence?

For that matter, Pollyanna talked to everybody about Jamie. She assumed that everybody would be as interested as she herself was. On most occasions she was not disappointed in the interest shown; but one day she met with a surprise. It came through Jimmy Pendleton.

"Say, look a-here," he demanded one afternoon, irritably. "Wasn't there anybody else down to Boston but just that everlasting 'Jamie'?"

"Why, Jimmy Bean, what do you mean?" cried Pollyanna.

The boy lifted his chin a little.

"I'm not Jimmy Bean. I'm Jimmy

THE LINCOLN SPIRIT

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

WHEN I shut my eyes I can sometimes see, vaguely, the picture of myself when I was a little girl in primary school. And very often this picture takes the form of a small blue sailor-suit figure standing in front of a big portrait finished in sepia and framed in brown. That picture hung on the wall of the first schoolroom that I can remember, and the kindly face of Abraham Lincoln smiled down from it. The first time I saw the picture, I wondered who the homely man could be. His face was furrowed with lines and covered with a stubbly beard. It reminded me of an old man I knew near my aunt's home—a man covered with rough foliage and dotted with rocky cliffs. Perhaps my little girl mind I did not formulate the thought very clearly, but it was there just the same.

The second time I looked at the picture I noticed the eyes, and somehow, explainably, my thoughts went into the mountain. I did not think of foliage or cliffs or hollows, however; for my mind now swept to the tops of it and the sunlight that glistened over it, and the birds that lit their nests in the shadow. So I chose the picture of Lincoln.

When I grew a bit older I began to read my primer stories about the great man. I spelled out the words that told how he went miles to borrow seed, hard miles that lay through swamps and unbroken roads. I read stories that spoke of his talks to soldiers, of his pardons to Confederate soldiers, of his grief over the great Civil War. When I began to read history I pondered over his Gettysburg address; and when I was in growing years I read books that talked of him, that told of his sense of duty, his wistfulness, his love of humanity.

During the time that I have been writing to you, friends of mine, I have had contact with not a few people who wanted an education more than anything else, almost, in the whole world. I have met, through the boys and girls who have sacrificed many things to learn. I have read stories of prayer and work and that might measure up to Lincoln's standard.

I have read stories, and had stories told to me, of men and women who were drifting through life with heavy resting on their shoulders, and their hearts lying like lead within their chests. I have had them tell of their sorrows and ask for comfort and a bit of help. Yes, I have come in contact with some deeply troubled people!

And then, too, there have been people—kind friends who have had hearts full of love for everyone, from the poor child next door down to the great man on the street corner, carrying the warmth of their own hearts to the coldness of some poverty-stricken man. But though I have met such people and read of them in books, I have never heard of any boys or girls, men or women, who have won an education over such frightful odds as this man, or who have been able, as he, to jest while their trouble was deepest, while their heart was loaded to the bursting point with tears; who have loved black and white, rich and poor, friends and foes as did Abraham Lincoln.

Sometimes, as I look around the busy New York streets, the noisy subway, the self-centered little cities that appear in every state, I wish that some of the Lincoln spirit could come back again and invade the earth with a bombardment of cheerfulness and gentleness. I wish that the gruff man who takes the only seat in the car while a little white-haired lady is standing, could feel a bit of the warm-heartedness that wept over battlefields and freed slaves. I wish that the girls who make scathing remarks from behind the shadow of their palms, could feel a little of the charity and love that made one man lay down his very life for a country of comparative strangers. I wish that the wise ones who from their own hearthstones try to settle the affairs of the nations could lean with a little more humility—as Lincoln did—on God!

I knew a small boy once who hated to go to school. Every morning just before nine o'clock he developed strange symptoms—headaches, and toothaches, and backaches, that disappeared marvelously after the ringing of the final bell. During his school hours he concentrated chiefly on weirdly drawn pictures and stiff balls of paper. He refused to do home work, balked utterly on studying. His mother, trying to teach by love, was in despair; his father gave up the thankless task after many spankings.

Then, at the psychological moment, some one gave the boy a book about Lincoln. It told of the early struggles, the life of the young man, finally of his presidential career and his noble death. The boy read it carefully, and then, to the surprise of his parents, began to do his school work.

"Some day"—he confided to his mother—"I may be President. Look at Lincoln—he didn't have half my chance!"

Look at Lincoln! He didn't have half the chance of most of us, but the few hours that he stole from his busy boy life were made to count. And now, after a slender chain of years, the nation spends a golden day doing honor to him and people mention his name with tenderness and perhaps a bit of awe. Look at the rugged mountain face, and the mouth that is wistful, and think of the disappointments he went through; think of the strain of seeing a country—his own country—going to pieces, and knowing that the fragments lay in his own hand. And then, friends of mine, look at the eyes. The eyes that carry you to a mountain top with peace and calm and bird-songs.

Oh, girls—young and old—and boys, too, catch the Lincoln spirit and make good. You have twice his chance.

THE GO-TO-CHURCH BANDS

CLINTON ALVORD of 7 Summer Street, Worcester, Mass., who is head and front of this movement for the young, receives emphatic approval for the idea from those churches that have adopted it. The pastor of the large Second Congregational Church of Oak Park, Ill., Rev. Edward J. Lyford, writes him as follows:

I have acknowledged the receipt of the pins which I am much pleased. There are many pastors who feel grateful for the suggestion you have given us in the Go-to-Church movement. It has been a splendid thing in our congregation.

The weekly calendar of that church lists the names of fifty-six Sunday school boys and girls who were faithful in church attendance for the first quarter of the second year. From the Old South Church in South Weymouth, Mass., Mr. Alvord has received this word:

The Go-to-Church Band has secured the attendance of a substantial number of children regularly, and has raised, of course, our total church attendance. I am surprised at its feasibility and the helpful elements involved. All in all the movement has been even better for the second term.

Mr. Alvord is glad to tell about the plan to any who are interested.

Find Out How Folks Like Puffed Rice and Wheat

Serve a heaping dish for breakfast and watch it disappear. Note how folks pass back for it—dish after dish—until the last airy grain is gone. Then ask them what they want tomorrow.

Leave a package where hungry boys can get it in the afternoon. Or girls can get it when making fudge. Note how the package melts away before they get enough.

Or, at suppertime, surround a bowl of milk with Puffed Wheat, bread and crackers. And see which one of the three is put into the milk.

Serve What They Prefer

That is our only plea. If they don't like Puffed Rice or Wheat—if they like something else better—give them what they want. But don't deny them if their preference is for bubbles of toasted grain.

They differ vastly in their flavor. Serve them both and let the folks say which they like better.

A WEEK in the WORLD'S NEWS

NEW YORK INVITES SUNDAY. Nearly 400 New York City and neighborhood ministers of all denominations have united in an invitation to Evangelist Billy Sunday to hold a series of revival meetings in the metropolis. It is understood that the evangelist has consented, making it conditional that a sum of $50,000 be raised for necessary expenses, that fifteen thousand prayer meetings be held in advance by way of spiritual preparation, and that arrangements be made for men's Bible classes on a vast scale, to be fully organized when he comes. He also desires the ministers to divide the city into sixty districts with a central committee over all. Mr. Sunday's meetings in Paterson, N. J., begin in March, and if his present program goes through uninterrupted he may be ready to open his Gospel campaign in New York a month later, or some time in May at farthest. This arrangement, however, is subject to alteration, owing to other calls which may demand first consideration.

ENGLAND AND THE VATICAN. Sir Henry Howard, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary from the King of England to the Holy See, has been received in state by the Pope, who is said to regard the resumption of diplomatic relations between England and the Vatican as permanent. The London Council of Protestant Societies, representing sixteen denominations, has protested vigorously to the government against the despatching of an envoy to the Pope, and has demanded the prompt termination of a mission which "in defiance of the national faith and policy, is a betrayal of national convictions, a humiliating subservience to a foe of civil and religious freedom."

PHILADELPHIA TO SAVE $4,000,000. Experts estimate that the housewives of Philadelphia have been giving $4,000,000 annually to cheats and tricksters who swindled them by fraudulent weights and measures, 56,000 doctored scales, measures with false bottoms, etc., etc., having been recently seized and exhibited in the municipal "How-to-Buy" show, where lectures on household economy were given to the thousands of women who attended, home weighing and measuring of all foodstuffs being advised. A per capita saving of $3 a year was promised families who practiced caution.

WHOA! Our horses are getting away from us. Europe's war has already drawn over 60,000 horses from America, and agents are scouring the country for more still to meet the demand from abroad. There would not be enough to fill the orders if Germany and Austria and Turkey could import our horses and mules as safely as can the nations of the Triple Entente.

CONGRESS MAY WORK OVERTIME. The sixty-fourth Congress, which ordinarily would not convene until December, may be called into extra session on the expiration on March 4 of the present Congress, because of the inability of the present Congress to dispose of the ship purchase bill, an administrative measure which cannot in the opinion of all concerned be left pending. Congress is divided along political lines on this measure. Developments in connection with the Dacia and the Wilhelmina may affect the passage of the bill.

AN OUTSPOKEN VETO. Clear and explicit was the message of President Wilson, sent to Congress on January 28, vetoing the immigration bill. His prime objections to the measure were the proposed closure of the "open door," and the application of the literacy test. With regard to the former, he pointed out that it was proposed by the bill "to all but close entirely the gates of asylum which have always been open to those who could find nowhere else the right and opportunity of constitutional agitation for what they conceived to be the natural and inalienable rights of men." He refused approval to the literacy test on the ground that "it excludes those to whom the opportunity of elementary education has been denied, without regard to their character, their purposes or their natural capacity." He challenges the supporters of the bill to produce any evidence showing that the country demands restrictive legislation to limit immigration. Until the American people demand such legislation, it is not to be considered.

CANAL CLOSING INSTEAD OF OPENING. Primarily because of continued slides that are giving the engineers some trouble in keeping the channel of the Panama Canal open, and incidentally because of the probability of an extra session of Congress, the plans for a formal opening of the canal have been postponed and the President, if he visits the exposition in California, will probably travel by rail. The formal canal opening may take place in July.

DRASTIC ECONOMY IN GERMANY. On January 26 the German Government took control of the empire's food supply, all stocks of corn, wheat and flour to be administered by the government, and meat supplies to be strictly conserved by the municipalities under government direction. The German people must now accommodate themselves to a bill of fare fixed by their government and determine their food purchases by a fixed scale of per capita allowance. The German Government has assured the State Department at Washington that foodstuffs shipped from the United States to Germany will not be seized for military use. The government's action is a war measure Republic is said to view this action, which has followed Japanese occupation of Kiauchau, with alarm.

AN IMPORTANT LABOR DECISION. In deciding brought against the Frisco Railway by a switchman threatened with dismissal if he did not withdraw from the Switchmen's Union, the Supreme Court January 25 declared unconstitutional the Kansas statute which makes it unlawful to coerce or influence any person against joining or remaining a member of an organization, as a condition of employment. Similar laws in thirteen other states and Porto Rico are made ineffective. Chief Justice Hughes and Holmes dissented from the decision of the court, which in effect gives employers the right to require employees to renounce membership in labor unions.

WILL EAST AND WEST MEET? It is stated in the press that the Japanese Society, Count Okuma, Japanese secretary of state, president, and the American Society of that society here have organized a committee of prominent men to investigate the causes of friction between America and Japan and to recommend ways and means to remove those causes.

NOT SURE CATTLE PLACED. Suspecting that foot and mouth disease, which recently threatened the meat supply of the country, had not been entirely stamped out, the Department of Agriculture late in January placed a temporary quarantine on the Union Stock Yards at Chicago, pending another complete disinfecting of the plant. The outbreak of the disease had cost the government $2,129,138 up to January 1, 1915. 101,176 animals having been slaughtered by that date, 47,735 swine, the remainder sheep and goats.

PROSPERITY! The Philadelphia North American January 29 prints the following despatch: "As the result of receiving the largest order in its history, the plant of the Chemical Products Company, at Warrenton, Oregon, started operations to its full capacity on January 28. The plant, which is one of the leading industries, has received a $500,000 order for gun-cotton from one of the warlike European powers, but which one the official of the company refuse to disclose. The plant will operate both day and night until the order is filled, which, it is understood, will require several months of steady operations. This is the second contract that has fallen to a Warrenton firm through the war."

THE SOUTH SEES THE SILVER LINING. Of the 1914 cotton crop of 16,250,000 bales, 9,520,000 had been marketed up to January 22 and the value of the remainder, 6,730,000 bales, and the visible supply besides, estimated at 5,217,000 bales on January 22, was $10 a bale in advance over November 1, or an increase of about $120,000,000 in the value of the cotton crop now in the South. Only $10,000 a barrel borrowed from the bankers' $135,000,000 loan pool, and the pool is extinct. A widespread improvement in all business in the South is reported.

THE WAR IN MEXICO. The forces of General Carranza, under command of General Obregon, entered Mexico City on the afternoon of January 28 without resistance, General Huerta retreating. Vera Cruz, however, will continue to be Carranza's headquarters and the real fighting is expected to take place around Tampico. A part of Villa's fighting strength was cut off from retreat to the north. No clear-cut information is available as to the disposition of the various bands operating on behalf of the various factions at war for the control of the Mexican Government. But occurring here and there with more or less fierceness, present nothing of decisive character can be said to be taking place.

WASHINGTON MAY TAKE A HAND IN HAITI AFFAIRS. According to the press the administration in Washington may soon send a commission to Hayti to advise political leaders on the early establishment of a stable government, a step in the direction of the action taken by the government in 1905 in relation to the affairs of the other island, Santo Domingo, by which the customs of that insecure republic have been administered by Americans, 10 per cent. of the collections being deposited in the United States for the benefit of creditors of the Dominican Republic. The plan has proved satisfactory to all concerned and may eventually be adopted in the interests of Hayti.

RUSSIAN HERO DIES. The famous commander of the troops at Port Arthur during the Russo-Japanese War, General Stessel, who surrendered the fortress to the Japanese after a three months' siege and was in consequence court-martialed and condemned to death, but later pardoned by Emperor Nicholas, died on January 17, according to a dispatch, a victim of paralysis.

"I wish I could make you see what your little niece has done for my sister," wrote Miss Wetherby; "but I'm afraid I can't. You would have to know what she was before. You did see her, to be sure, and perhaps you saw something of the hush and gloom in which she had shrouded herself for so many years. But you can have no conception of her bitterness of heart, her lack of aim and interest, her insistence upon eternal mourning.

"Then came Pollyanna. Probably I didn't tell you, but my sister regretted her promise to take the child almost the minute it was given; and she made the stern stipulation that the moment Pollyanna began to preach, back she should come to me. Well, she hasn't preached—at least, my sister says she hasn't; and my sister ought to know. And yet—well, just let me tell you what I found when I went to see her yesterday. Perhaps nothing else could give you a better idea of what that wonderful little Pollyanna of yours has accomplished.

"To begin with, as I approached the house, I saw nearly all the shades were up—they used to be down, 'way down to the sill. The minute I stepped into the hall I heard music—Parsival. The drawing-rooms were open, and the air was sweet with roses.

"Mrs. Carew and Master Jamie are in the music room," said the maid. And there I found them—my sister, and the youth she has taken into her home, listening to one of those modern contrivances that can hold an entire opera company, including the orchestra.

"The boy was in a wheel chair. He was pale, but plainly beautifully happy. My sister looked ten years younger. Her usually colorless cheeks showed a faint pink, and her eyes glowed and sparkled. A little later, after I had talked a few minutes with the boy, my sister and I went upstairs to her own rooms; and there she talked to me—of Jamie. Not of the old Jamie, as she used to, with tear-wet eyes and hopeless sighs, but of the new Jamie—and there were no sighs nor tears now. There was, instead, the eagerness of enthusiastic interest.

"Della, he's wonderful," she began. Everything that is best in music, art and literature seems to appeal to him in a perfectly marvelous fashion, only, of course, he needs development and training. That's what I'm going to see that he gets. A tutor is coming tomorrow. Of course his language is something awful; at the same time, he has read so many good books that his vocabulary is quite amazing—and you should hear the stories he can reel off! Of course, in general education he is very deficient; but he's eager to learn, so that will soon be remedied. He loves music, and I shall give him what training in that he wishes. I have already put in a stock of carefully selected records. I wish you could have seen his face when he first heard that Holy Grail music. He knows all about King Arthur and his Round Table, and he prattles of knights and lords and ladies as you and I do of the members of our own family—only sometimes I don't know whether his Sir Lancelot means the ancient knight or a squirrel in the Public Garden. And, Della, I believe he can be made to walk. I'm going to have Dr. Ames see him, anyway, and—

"And so on and on she talked, while I sat amazed and tongue-tied, but, oh, so happy! I tell you all this, dear Mrs. Chilton, so you can see for yourself how interested she is, how eagerly she is going to watch this boy's growth and development, and how, in spite of herself, it is all going to change her attitude toward life. She can't do what she is doing for this boy Jamie and not do for herself at the same time. Never again, I believe, will she be the soured, morose woman she was before. And it's all because of Pollyanna.

"Pollyanna! Dear child—and the best part of it is, she is so unconscious of the whole thing. I don't believe even my sister yet quite realizes what is taking place within her own heart and life, and certainly Pollyanna doesn't—least of all does she realize the part she played in the change.

"And now, dear Mrs. Chilton, how can I thank you? I know I can't; so I'm not even going to try. Yet in your heart I believe you know how grateful I am to both you and Pollyanna.

"DELLA WETHERBY."

"Well, it seems to have worked a cure, all right," smiled Dr. Chilton, when his wife had finished reading the letter to him.

To his surprise she lifted a quick, remonstrative hand.

"Thomas, don't, please!" she begged. "Why, Polly, what's the matter? Aren't you glad that—that the medicine worked?"

Mrs. Chilton dropped despairingly back in her chair.

"There you go again, Thomas," she sighed. "Of course I'm glad that this misguided woman has forsaken the error of her ways and found that she can be of use to some one. And of course I'm glad that Pollyanna did it. But I am not glad to have that child continually spoken of as if she were a—bottle of medicine, or a 'cure.' Don't you see?"

"Nonsense! After all, where's the harm? I've called Pollyanna a tonic ever since I knew her."

"Harm! Thomas Chilton, that child is growing older every day. Do you want to spoil her? Thus far she has been utterly unconscious of her extraordinary power. And therein lies the secret of her success. The minute she consciously sets herself to reform somebody, you know as well as I do that she will be simply impossible. Consequently, heaven forbid that she ever gets it into her head that she's anything like a cure-all for poor, sick, suffering humanity."

"Nonsense! I wouldn't worry," laughed the doctor.

"But I do worry, Thomas."

"But, Polly, think of what she's done," argued the doctor. "Think of Mrs. Snow and John Pendleton, and quantities of others—why, they're not the same people at all that they used to be, any more than Mrs. Carew is. And Pollyanna did do it—bless her heart!"

"I know she did," nodded Mrs. Polly Chilton, emphatically. "But I don't want Pollyanna to know she did it! Oh, of course she knows it in a way. She knows she taught them to play the glad game with her, and that they are lots happier in consequence. And that's all right. It's a game—her game, and they're playing it together. To you I will admit that Pollyanna has preached to us one of the most powerful sermons I ever heard; but the minute she knows it—well, I don't want her to. That's all. And right now, let me tell you that I've decided that I will go to Germany with you this fall. At first I thought I wouldn't. I didn't want to leave Pollyanna—and I'm not going to leave her now. I'm going to take her with me."

"Take her with us? Good! Why not?"

"I've got to. That's all. Furthermore, I should be glad to plan to stay a few years, just as you said you'd like to. I want to get Pollyanna away, quite away from Beldingsville for awhile. I'd like to keep her sweet and unspoiled if I can. And she shall not get silly notions into her head if I can help myself. Why, Thomas, I've heard there's even talk of somebody's putting her into a book. Imagine it—Pollyanna seeing herself in a book! Why, Thomas Chilton, do we want that child made an insufferable little prig?"

"We certainly don't," laughed the doctor. "But for that matter, I don't believe anything or anybody could make her so. However, this German idea suits me to a T. You know I didn't want to come away when I did—if it hadn't been for Pollyanna. So the sooner we get back there the better I'm satisfied. And I'd like to stay—for a little practice, as well as study."

"Then that's settled." And Aunt Polly gave a satisfied sigh.

TWO MILLION CHILD LABORERS

THE eleventh annual conference on child labor was held in Washington on January 5 and 6 under the auspices of the National Child Labor Committee.

The United States Congress was represented by Hon. A. Mitchell Palmer, M.C., and Senator William S. Kenyon. Mr. Palmer spoke on the "Constitutionality of a Federal Child Labor Law." He said that several child labor bills are now before Congress, but that the one prepared by the National Committee on Child Labor is absolutely constitutional. He spoke of the enormity of crime in the child labor evil, and proposed "doing a man's part to help in wiping the thing out of America." Senator Kenyon said: "I would rather be the pal of a bank-robbler, or the robber himself, than associate with an exploiter of child life," and he added: "Men trying to coin the labor of dwarfed and diseased children into profit should be prosecuted unmercifully."

Representatives from state child labor organizations gave detailed reports concerning efforts to advance the age when children may be put to labor, and to decrease the hours of daily labor. In Illinois an eight-hour day for children is now proposed, with sixteen years as the flat minimum age. The new governor of Pennsylvania before his election declared that "Pennsylvania must have the best child labor law of any state in the Union." In some of the states as high as from 27 to 47 per cent. of the children employed in mills and factories are between ten and thirteen years old, and small and pinched for their age! Two million children in all are employed in the United States.

One session of the conference was devoted to the consideration of a children's code. Two years ago, the Ohio legislature appointed a commission to codify the laws pertaining to children. It is now proposed that the nation shall do a similar work. The United States commissioner of education stated that all laws pertaining to education were now being codified by the Bureau of Education and would be ready soon.

"A Children's Charter" was proposed in which such rights as the following should be guaranteed: General intelligence as a basis of fitness for life before being put to labor; no child put to labor until physically fit; minimum of fourteen years with a rising standard; compulsory education; labor occupations regulated by schools; a decent environment in which to grow up.

There was only one dissenting voice in the conference: that of an outsider. He said in part: "The fact that a boy of thirteen years works in North Carolina can in no way injure the citizens of New York or Massachusetts, and plainly speaking, it is none of their business." He was a long way off from realizing that children are the greatest asset of a nation. We do not want our children to grow up in idleness, else they will make most unreliable Americans, but they must be employed in ways that will help and not hinder the delicate processes of maturing. The whole danger lies in commercializing child labor.

THE DEATH OF ELI AND HIS SONS

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR FEBRUARY 21. I SAM. 4: 1-18

Two Bad Sons, and the Harm They Did

By Arthur H. Howland

THE Israelites, though they "knew that Samuel was established to be a prophet of the Lord" (I Sam. 3: 20) and though his word had come "to all Israel" (4: 1), did not heed his counsel and his warning. Perhaps they respected his youth, a thing which Paul commended Timothy is apt to happen in the case of young prophets.

Things at the spiritual headquarters of Israel were in a bad way. The two sons of Eli, who was both priest and judge, themselves priests of God, were outrageously wicked, and doubtless had wide and powerful influence. So Israel, unfaithful again, lay down before her enemies.

The fact that Samuel is not mentioned at all in the fourth, fifth and sixth chapters, with the exception of a single reference at the beginning of the first verse of chapter four, which really belongs to the end of chapter three, has led to the conjecture that he may have been absent from Shiloh during these events. At least we know that living in direct communication with God as he did, he would never have countenanced sending the ark out to a battlefield.

What a grotesque picture! Hophni and Phinehas, vile and impious beyond description, accompanying the ark of God in the hope that the physical presence of the mere symbol of God's spiritual presence would bring a victory which their own wickedness had made impossible.

We see this tragic travesty repeated again and again in human life. People do wrong, and then instead of undoing the wrong, attempt by some other method or observance to bring back God's power to their lives. The inevitable result takes place—defeat, disaster, shame, ruin!

We should read on to the end of the chapter, to get that terrible word, "The glory is departed." How often the glory of God fades from a church, an organization, a nation, because it has not been true to Him. There is only one place where the glory is to be found—that is near to God. And that nearness means the eagerness of obedience and faith and purity. When these are lost, no matter what physical signs there may be, ceasing to prove God's presence, He is absent, and the glory has departed. Consider the havoc wrought by these unfaithful sons of a good home. He lives, their father's life, the life of a great army, their nation's life, the presence and glory of God—lost because they sinned!

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By Rev. F. B. Meyer, D.D.

"Be ye doers of the word, and not hearers only, deluding your own selves." James 1: 22. How often people delude themselves! They go to a meeting with elaborate arrangements for taking notes of what may be said, and you meet them at the close with smiling faces, saying: "We've got it all down." The delusion is to suppose that you have really got a truth, or a fragment of it, because its statement has been appreciated by the mind. Nothing can be farther from the fact. We only possess, when we are possessed. We only know, when we do. We have only that amount of the Word of God which we put into practice and incorporate in words and deeds. The one test of Christian discipleship consists in obedience—not to win the favor of God, but because we have been saved by his grace and love him for himself. The previous verse sheds a ray of helpful light on the whole matter, especially when we connect "the engrained word" with our Lord, who is the Word of God. When the nature of Jesus is engrafted on to the poor stem of our human weakness, and we send up the sap of our will through him into sweet and strong lives, we grow by giving, we increase by doing; as we obey his bidding, we become changed into his likeness. We hear and do the words of the WORD, and become Christlike, i. e., Christians.

"What If I Had Been Death?"

By Amos R. Wells

HOW did it happen that Eli, the good old man, had two sons so wild and wicked as Hophni and Phinehas? We may get a hint of the true answer from the story of the young Scottish mother who had hard work to keep her two-year-old boy from running into the village streets. She had just brought the lad home after a long run when she met a wise old fellow, Donald McTavish, and told him her troubles. "First I buttoned the gate, but he soon found out how to open it. I put the button higher, but he soon climbed up to it. I hid the box he climbed on, but he found another. I then put the button as high as it would go on the fence, but now he reaches up and opens it with a stick. What can I do?" "Put the button on the boy," answered the wise old Donald. That evidently is what Eli, with all his judicial authority, failed to do for his two sons.

In sharp contrast with Hophni and Phinehas we read of Samuel, and that "the word of Samuel came to all Israel." This wide influence of the holy lad was not on account of anything spectacular that he had done; it was merely on account of his character. As Rowland Hill said, "We can do more by being good than in any other way." A single grain of musk will scent a room for ten years, and at the end of that time weigh apparently as much as at the beginning. So with the quiet, all-pervasive influence of goodness.

When the Israelites were so severely defeated by the Philistines, they cried indignantly, "Wherefore hath the Lord smitten us today before the Philistines?" They should have gone to Eli and asked him to learn wherein they had sinned, but they did not. There is a reason back of all calamities, and we can discover it. A minister was praising an old woman for the lovely flowers which she had made to grow over an old stump in her yard. "Well, she said, 'I found I couldn't get rid of it, so I made it raise nasturtiums.'" Thus the wise man will make every trouble raise the flowers of an ennobled character.

But the foolish Israelites substituted a gilded chest for repentance and confession and amendment; they put the outward form of religion before the inward reality, and thought that the ark would answer their purpose instead of obedience to Him who dwelt between the cherubim. "Religion," said Bunyan, "is the best armor that a man can have, but the worst cloak." Some men, as the Sunday School Times once said, make religion consist of rite; rather, it is based on right, on a moral standard, and goes on to wright, which signifies work, namely, the doing of what is right. The Israelites were ever wont to rest on a rite rather than do the right.

While we must here condemn the Israelites, we find something to praise in the Philistines. Surely theirs was a grand war-cry, "Be strong, quit yourselves like men, and fight." How glad we should be if this had been the war-cry of the Israelites! Said a little boy, "I love my mother with all my strength"; and when asked to explain, he said he meant that he was showing his love to his mother by carrying the big hods of coal from the cellar up four flights to the rooms where they lived. God wants his people to love him with all their strength, fighting sin, and sloth, and infidelity. The Philistines had the right war-cry on the wrong side.

What a picture is that of the aged Eli, sitting and waiting for news of the battle, and trembling for the ark of God! The ark was capable, as it decidedly proved, of taking care of itself. Like many others before and after, Eli feared for the wrong thing. The Boston Board of Health wished to move its bacteriological laboratory, but the owners of the new building refused accommodations when they learned that deadly diseases were lurking in the bottles of the laboratory. Their fear was foolish, since the physicians kept the disease germs tightly sealed and under perfect control. So God keeps the forces of his universe perfectly under control, and wisely ordered. We need never fear his providence, but only the uncontrolled forces of evil in our own hearts.

How little Eli expected the next event when he took that seat by the wayside! An eccentric minister broke in on a busy merchant. "Did you expect me?" he asked abruptly. "No, sir." "What if I had been death?" was the solemn question.

Echoes from the Holy Land

By Rev. Franklin E. Hoskins, D.D.

Member of Syria Mission

SHILOH, the place of peace and tranquillity, like many other beautiful spots in Palestine became in later days a place where scenes of sorrow and evil tidings disturbed its sacred rest.

Eli comes into the Bible narrative as a very old man and nothing is told concerning his earlier life. Hannah was a model for mothers, and Eli a beacon for fathers. He reproved Hannah for drinking, and then discovering his error gave her his blessing. Combining the functions and honors of judge with those of his priestly office, he appears to have been a weak parent unable to control his own sons. This weakness characterized his care over Israel as the people drifted into conflict with their ancient enemies the Philistines, who had been quiet since the days of Samson. Hophni and Phinehas were worthless sons, "men of Belial," profaning their father's sacred calling by their greed and licentiousness.

After Israel's grievous defeat at Aphek (a fortress) in the plain of Sharon thirty miles away, they resorted to the desperate expedient of taking the Ark from Shiloh and carrying it to the field of battle accompanied by the two worthless sons of Eli. In this act they supposed that they, though unworthy, could compel God's help without praying for it. They had ceased to be religious and had become superstitious. The Ark in the days of Moses was the symbol of God's presence, but was no longer so to these "men of Belial."

The Arabs have a proverb that an empty gun frightens both its bearer and the man at whom it may be pointed. The wicked hearts of the Israelites must have failed them even "though bearing the Ark," and the Philistines were afraid, for they said, "God is coming to the camp." The symbol was not God, and God was not fighting for Israel that day, hence the dreadful defeat, the flying messenger, the evil tidings in Shiloh and the death of the aged priest.

"Clothes rent and with earth upon his head." These two acts are the most universal signs of helpless grief and dismay in all parts of the Orient.

Eli's seat, by the side of the gate, is a familiar feature of primitive country towns. It was probably elevated after the fashion of a throne seat, peculiar to him as a mark of his office or dignity. To this day judges sit on a wide sort of a divan where they can curl their feet beneath them. Such a seat in the Orient seems to be as necessary to a judge as the horse-hair wig to a Scotch lawyer.

THE MILLION TESTAMENT FUND

Two years ago three little Kentucky girls, Nancy Bell Fisher, age 10, and her sisters Louise Catherine, age 8, and William, age 6, won three precious prizes. Each of them received a Testament from a religious newspaper inscribed with their name and the explanation, "For memorizing as many hymns as I am years old."

These three little girls heard the appeal for "a million Testaments for a million soldiers." They set up their minds that they would send these three precious Testaments to three soldiers in Europe, told their grandmother about this wish and asked if they might carry it out. What could she do but consent? The little girls' parents are not living and they make their home with their grandparents at War, Ky.

All the way to New York came these three little volumes, each of them inscribed in round little-girlish handwriting, under description they had loved so long and shown so many times to friends: "Donated to some soldier in Europe."

Reading the story first we may think: "They should not have made such a sacrifice." But when we study their faces, when think of those three soldiers who will soon have the joyful message brought to their hands by this genuine selfless, our eyes are apt to fill with tears and we ask ourselves: "What am I going to do to match that sacrifice?"

The appeal of the World's Sunday School Association for this Million Testament Fund met with a quick and hearty response from Sunday school scholars all over the United States. By January 20 there had come to the treasurer of the World's Sunday School Association, Mr. Arthur M. Harris, $2,689.66, representing more than 50,000 nickels; and in most cases there was but one nickel from a scholar. Remittances are coming in now from superintendents or treasurers of the Sunday schools and the number of such contributions has been growing steadily; yesterday there were 107 letters, almost all containing substantial gifts from Sunday schools. Each scholar who gives a nickel is presented with a bookmark receipt on which is printed the request, "Place this book-mark in your Bible, and remember in your prayers him to whom your Testament is given—God knows his name."

Superintendents are asked to present the appeal to their Sunday schools and teachers to take it up with their classes. Send remittances to Mr. Arthur M. Harris, treasurer, World's Sunday School Association, 216 Metropolitan Tower, New York City, and ask for book-mark receipts to cover the number of nickels given.

A grandfather at Creston, Ohio, writes: "Having noticed your interesting solicitation in the Christian Herald, I take pleasure to enclose herewith $1 for twenty souvenir book-marks, for sixteen grandchildren and four great grandchildren—a few of them now at home in the Father's house of 'many mansions'—to make sure that they all may be happily enrolled in this heaven-born Sunday school movement. I can sympathize all the more with this Christian work of love and charity because of my experience of a half century ago, when, with eight brothers and many dear comrades, I was a soldier in our Civil War. Then we learned the value of God's Word in the pocket and in the heart."

Send your contributions to Mr. Harris today.

Questions and Answers

Mrs. A. E. H., Connecticut. 1. Do you think that grown-up children should be reminded of their wrong-doings, or should their parents ignore them and act as if everything was all right? When the children know how anxious the parents are for their spiritual welfare and do not pay any heed to it, it is very trying to one's faith and patience. 2. Is audible prayer any more efficacious than a whispered prayer, so long as it is earnest, and comes from the heart?

1. Grown-up children should certainly be "reminded" of their wrong-doings, but not in a nagging, impatient spirit. It is easy to err in both directions. The Sunday school lessons for February 14 and 21 show the disaster that came to Eli because he did not "restrain" his sons from their evil ways. But children should always be made to feel that the admonitions of their parents are made in a spirit of genuine love. The parents should try always to be thoroughly companionable with their children, entering into their pleasures, sharing their sorrows, and making the home atmosphere truly delightful and affectionate. We must make our religion truly winsome. Then, too, as the children grow toward maturity, parents should leave many matters to their own consciences and judgment which they formerly decided authoritatively for them. It is very easy to err by being too strict; the frequent result of this is that a parent comes suddenly and terribly to realize that, while he was imagining that he had supreme authority, he really had no authority at all, and the son or daughter has snatched himself or herself out of the parent's hands and away from the restraints of home. Love and prayer will win, but not force. The bishop said to Monica, mother of the wicked young Augustine: "The son of so many prayers cannot be lost." And he became the great saint and teacher. 2. Audible prayer is not necessarily more efficacious, but if others do not hear the prayer they cannot help with their faith. When Jesus recommended praying by twos and in groups, he certainly thought those uniting would pray so that all could understand.

E. R. O., Missouri. I joined the Methodist Church when but a small child, and have fallen by the wayside. I do not think that I was thoroughly converted. When they ask the Christians to come forward, I do not go, thinking that I have not kept to my promise. Please advise me.

It is a mistake to keep looking back and trying to label and measure past experiences. If you fell into transgression after you professed conversion you should seek forgiveness again. This does not necessarily mean that you need to make a public confession and seek publicly for restoration to God's grace. You may, right while reading this letter, accept Jesus by faith as your Saviour and Friend, believing that he does just now forgive all the sins of the past and that you are truly his child. You will find peace coming back to your heart the moment you begin to trust him. Then when the invitation comes to identify yourself with those who love him you will be glad to do so.

Miss F. E. P., Woolwine, Va. In what vocations in life do we find languages other than English most essential, and what are most generally used?

Since the Spanish war many young American business men have found the knowledge of Spanish of special value. Many of our banking and business houses have transactions in Mexico and South America, and here also Spanish is useful. In some special fields of work, such as chemistry or certain lines of machinery, a knowledge of German would be advantageous. Singers find it useful to know Italian, and also German. Students of painting and architecture—and chemistry—find French a special aid. German is also helpful to students and teachers of philosophy. For writers Latin is helpful, but far from essential. Ministers and other Bible students find Greek and Hebrew helpful, but with the excellent translations and commentaries available they are by no means necessary. It is convenient to have the rudiments of Latin, German and French, as it saves one from error in pronouncing names and adapted words and makes it easier to master a desired language later. Any educational book house will suggest good grammars. Write to the Berlitz School of Languages, New York, for correspondence methods.

M. L., Edinburg, Ill. 1. The Bible teaching of future punishment is unmistakable, although we have no definite revelation as to the character of the abode of the lost. Some have contended that the word "everlasting" can also be translated "age-lasting," and others have held that eternal punishment is inconsistent with God's love and forgiveness. But we have no warrant for disputing the plain teaching of Scripture or distorting it to meet our own wishes. Our duty is to accept salvation now, rather than to speculate on a future which we can only dimly comprehend. Besides, the punishment of the impenitent is, after all, the result of their choice, if they reject repentance and forgiveness here. 2. We are distinctly told that the times of the events that indicate the end of the age are a mystery, hidden from all men and even from the angels, consequently human calculations and predictions on the subject are futile. Many expert students of prophecy who have fixed dates for coming events foretold in Scripture, have been compelled to admit that they were groping in a region where man's knowledge could not avail.

D. B. F., Bloomington, Ind. 1. The differences between the two churches mentioned are not vital, nor are they such as need keep a home divided in opinions. 2. The passage in John 9: 31 is the testimony of the once blind man to the power and authority of Jesus, who had opened his eyes. The Pharisees would not admit the possibility of such a miracle, yet here was the man before them, insisting that Jesus came from God, and that the righteousness of Jesus was proved by the miracle, since "God heareth not sinners." It is quite probable that the Pharisees took this as a reflection on their own assumption of righteousness. It was at this point that they excommunicated him. . . . In dealing with the one striking phrase, "God heareth not sinners," it should not be overlooked that it is absolutely true in one sense only—that is: He heareth not the unrepentant who abide in their wickedness and who, like the Pharisees, have their hearts and minds judicially sealed against the entrance of divine truth. But the contrite heart he will not despise, nor will he ever turn away from the cry of the repentant soul for forgiveness.

Reader. You write about feeling a strange shrinking from death. You must not chide yourself too severely for this, for it is something experienced by many good people. A man may be truly brave yet have a shrinking from pain. He goes straight ahead toward the pain without the slightest thought of wavering, yet dreads the pain that waits him. Then, too, many shrink from the mystery of death. But there should be no real fear. Christ can and will save us from that. He conquered sin, which gives death its sting; and he went through death and the grave triumphantly, and promises to be with each of us when our time comes to die. As a matter of fact, however, there is apparently much less distress connected with the experience of death than people generally think. Nature usually provides a physical soothing and partial stupor which make the passing easy. When to this kindness of nature is added the infinite grace of Jesus, who takes us by the hand to lead us into the new home, there should be no apprehension at all. The deathbed of many believers has been truly glorious. In these cases there was no numbness of nature, but a keenness of intellect which seems to pierce the veil and observe the realities of the spirit world. It should be our chief concern now to let God cleanse our hearts from all sin and to bring us unto a rich experience of his love. With this blessing and this companionship we may face death triumphantly and, both now and when our hour comes, shout with Paul: "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?"

A good friend of the Christian Herald, Mr. Samuel Peter of Atwood, Ont., says that he would be greatly pleased to have the readers of the Christian Herald give him a "postcard shower" on his seventieth birthday, March 25. He writes that in the little village in which he lives a Belgian relief fund has been raised, one thousand dollars worth of blankets and cheese has been sent to Belgium and fourteen hundred dollars a month pledged as long as the war lasts. This is a notable record. Christian Herald readers will be glad to remember Mr. Peter's request, and time their postcards so that they will reach him on his birthday.

Miscellaneous

W. H. R., Sterling, Ill. Thanks for letter. We believe, with you, that the attitude of the Christian should be one of prayerful expectation and preparation, but that the "times and seasons" are not to be revealed to human searching.

M. V. B. P. The date of the birth of George Whitefield is, as you state, December 16, 1714. The date given in the article mentioned was intended by the author to be a day of general memorial last year, but that was not made clear, unfortunately.

Mrs. A. L. C., Yorktown, N. Y., and others. The history of the Christian Herald Prayer League is found in the Christian Herald Almanac for 1915. This book also contains much other material of interest and value. It will be forwarded to any address for ten cents.

J. H. M., Center, Col. 1. In the very earliest days of which we have any record of man's existence, there were apparently but two divisions of time: the morning and the evening. 2. Adam lived to be 930 years old (see Gen. 5: 5), and according to chronologists he died in 3242 B.C. This latter calculation, however, may be open to question.

H. M. C., Craig, Col., in a letter which is a sample of many others at this season of good wishes, writes: "The Christian Herald is next to my Bible, for it is my delight. My greatest wish for the Christian Herald Family is that they may let more of the kingdom of heaven reign in their hearts. I have studied many years to know my Bible, and find that we must obey God and trust our dear Saviour, if we want happiness."

C. K. W., Kempton, Ind. Many books have been written on Revelation, and learned men have struggled with the prophetic problems there presented. The results are far from satisfactory. The particular passage you mention is one concerning which no two interpreters agree. The same general remarks apply to Daniel. We must be content to await the solution of these mysteries in God's own time and way.

A. L. B., Verona, Miss. The assertion that "God is the author of the war" is utterly insupportable. Had the various governments appealed to God's revealed Word, they would never have gone to war, but would have settled their differences by peaceful measures, each making concessions to the other. The Bible teaches us to forgive our enemies and that all races of men are of one blood and should live in harmony and mutual friendship.

are destined to have a significant part. This is because their ranks embrace so largely the coming leaders of the most vital, the most potent, the most hopeful forces—the Christian forces—of all the countries and of all the races. What can be more important for the kingdom of God in the coming age than that the work of Christ be carried forward with wisdom, unselfish devotion and consuming zeal among those who more than any others are to guide Christian thought and action in each nation?

With the call to prayer are stated, among other objects for thanksgiving: Notable ingatherings among the students of China, and successful work among students in Latin Europe, especially Portugal and South America and among the negro students of the United States.

UNIVERSAL DAY OF PRAYER FOR STUDENTS

THE present world situation constitutes the most powerful call to prayer ever extended to North American students. It is a time for penitence and true searching of heart to discover wherein we may be responsible for unbrotherly relations, such as have involved our fellow students of Europe in the testing and temptations of war. A majority of the students in the belligerent nations have enlisted; thousands have been slain and wounded. But when all international fellowships seemed to be breaking, the leaders and members of our Christian federation were held together by the bonds of prayer. Shall we not, therefore, pray in confidence that the self-sacrificing devotion of European students to their country may inspire the students of North America with more intense devotion to Christ's greater work of reconstruction?

With these earnest words, John R. Mott and Charles D. Hurrey, executive secretaries of the Student Department of the International Young Men's Christian Associations, begin a letter to Y. M. C. A. leaders, calling for special zeal in preparing for the celebration of February 25 as a Universal Day of Prayer for Students.

In an accompanying circular letter, signed by Mr. Mott as secretary and Karl Fries, chairman of the World's Student Christian Federation, are the following significant statements:

In the vast and transcendently important work of repair and reconstruction, the Christian Student Movements of the world, with their branches in 2,500 different universities and colleges in over forty nations (including all the nations now at war) and their combined membership of over 155,000 students and professors,

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETINGS

NOTES ON THE CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR, EPWORTH LEAGUE AND BAPTIST YOUNG PEOPLE'S UNION TOPICS

Favorite Chapters of the Bible and Why

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U.
Topic for February 21. Psalm 23.
(A Memory Meeting)

HOW many chapters of the Bible can you recite from memory? You certainly know this psalm, the 23d, and the first Psalm, and the 13th chapter of 1st Corinthians. Not sure about that? Then the 14th chapter of John and the 15th; the 53d and 55th of Isaiah; the 91st Psalm, Colossians 3. What riches these are for memory's treasure house!

You cannot begin to reckon what advantages there are in having the memory stored with Scripture passages. When swift and horrible temptations come the words will fly to your lips as they came to the Saviour's in his hour of trial. When a great sorrow comes they will hold you up. Often when perplexed they will show you the way. When you are trying to help others the words of the Book will come to your aid. Best of all, these memories will keep you conscious of the presence and love of God.

What new thing can be said about this "Shepherd Psalm"? Yet we shall not have exhausted its rich treasure till "all the days of our life" have passed; and—who knows?—even in heaven it will cheer and strengthen us.

Remember the new emphasis. We are not to seek God's blessing selfishly. We must not seek it simply to make us happy, but to equip us for making others happy. So do not stop at my Shepherd, my lying down, my being led, my soul's restoration and victories, my deliverance, a table prepared for me, anointing for my head, fulness of my cup, goodness and mercy for me, and a place for me in God's house forever. We shall lose every one of these blessings unless we try to pass them on to others, urging, toiling, striving that they may share them with us.

Our real business with God's word is to announce it to others, first taking its bounty for our own deliverance and enrichment, then assuring others that we have found his word true and know what he has done for us he will do for them.

Samuel: The Benediction of a Spiritual Home

Epworth League Topic for February 21. (1 Sam. 1: 21 to 2: 2; 3: 1)

DO YOU like to stay out evenings? That seems to be a strange question with which to begin a Scripture study for a devotional meeting. But I suppose most of our young people would confess to a certain thrill of pleasure in planning for an evening out and a peculiar zest about the merry hours spent away from home.

Now we are not going to say that there is anything wrong about this, but right now, while you are thinking of the pleasure of an evening out, think of the pleasure of an evening home. That is a different sort of pleasure, but isn't it a deeper, truer, finer sort of pleasure? This business of going away from home to find our pleasure makes the beginning of danger.

You know some houses where the boys and girls really have their best times at home; where they really prefer staying home to going out; where every night before and after study hours there is romping and singing and jollity; where every Sunday evening there are songs around the piano in the parlor and delightful, quiet talks; where the very books and pictures and dishes seem to spell—happiness. That is what a home ought to be.

And when boys and girls begin to get restless at home and come to require almost every evening that thrill of an adventure outside the home circle, it's time to plan for brightening up the home atmosphere.

One really grave problem in this business is the claim of the church upon the young people. The home must not be forgotten in the plans for the church. And the obligation of choir, study class, social, or other church functions should not involve a weekly program that means more nights away from home than at home—nor anywhere near as many.

Joseph, Moses, Samuel, David, Jesus, John, Timothy—these are some of the great names that emphasize the power of the right sort of home.

Just now—in these days of automobiles and moving pictures, days of furious haste and exaggerated excitement, days in which some young people are drowning themselves in pleasure and others wearing themselves out with work—even church work or welfare work—it is necessary to sound an earnest plea for the claims of Home.

Our lesson is about a spiritual home. Not a home where cant abounds; not a home of over-strict prohibitions; but a home of which the fragrant, buoyant, helpful spirit of Jesus is the very atmosphere, whose members are trying to be like him, to serve him, and have found the secret of loving him.

This is really a lesson for parents rather than for sons and daughters. But sons and daughters must help the parents to make home the kind of a place it ought to be. Read this lesson over with your parents; talk about it with them. Make your home the right kind.

SENSE ABOUT FOOD

Facts Worth Knowing

It is a serious question so many people know just what to eat when their stomach is out of order and it causes trouble.

Grape-Nuts food can be tried at any time with the certainty that it will do good. Actual experience of people who have tried it to anyone interested.

A Terre Haute woman writes: "I suffered with indigestion for many years, ever since an attack of typhoid fever, and at times could eat nothing but the very lightest food, and even so with my stomach I would never had to eat anything."

"I was urged to try Grape-Nuts since using it I do not have to restrict myself any more, but I can eat at any time and feel nourished and satisfied. Dyspepsia is a thing of the past and I am now strong and well."

"My husband also had an experience with Grape-Nuts. He was very weak and sickly one spring, and would not attend to his work. He was at the doctor's care but medicine did not seem to do him any good until he began to leave off ordinary food and eat Grape-Nuts. It was surprising to see the change in him. He grew better and off, and naturally he has none of the old trouble of indigestion."

"Our boy thinks he cannot take food without Grape-Nuts, and he is as fast at school that his teacher marvels on it. I am satisfied that it is because of the great nourishing elements Grape-Nuts."

This mother is right. Grape-Nuts is a certain and remarkable builder of body, nerves and brain.

"There's a Reason."

The Most Extraordinary Announcement in the History of the Automobile

CHANDLER SIX $1295

For the New Season

NOW comes the only high-grade six-cylinder motor car of standard size for less than $1300. The Chandler! This identical car last summer broke sales records at $1595 and set the standards of the light six market. Two years ago, lacking many of its present refinements, it was a sensation at $1785.

And yet here it is today, the class and standard-maker of the market, with the price for this season fixed at $1295.

How can Chandler do it when similar cars still sell from two hundred dollars higher?

The Chandler Company has made money from the day that it first took the road. The Chandler has pointed the way, every step of the way. And now, with maximum production, with an overhead expense so small that it astounds other manufacturers, with no old loads to carry and no old scores to wipe out, and with our working capital of real money, we have set this record-breaking price.

The Chandler for the new season is identically and positively the same model the whole country admired so much at $1595. We will continue it throughout the season at the new price.

At this new price, the pioneer Chandler retains absolutely every feature of construction and quality that has made it the leader of all light sixes. You will find all these features on the Chandler, and not on any other six selling for less than $2000.

Hudson Is My Ideal Car

John Dunley

A Brown Huxley

L. G. Maxine

10,000 Owners Endorse It
After Tests for Two Seasons, in 43 Countries on Some 25 Million Miles of Road

Once the HUDSON Six-40 stood alone, the pioneer in lightness and economy applied to a 7-passenger Six.

It introduced a hundred innovations. All of them were wanted. Every man realized that their fulfillment would change the whole aspect of motoring.

But radical advances are always subject to question. New things must be proved. Every new type, even though Howard E. Coffin designs it, must run the gantlet of cynicism and attack. And here was a type which proposed, for one thing, to save 1000 pounds in weight.

Now the Pattern Car

Now this HUDSON Six-40, in its second season, is the pattern car of the day. It is the most-copied car in America. What it stands for has become the almost universal aim.

It has made the Six triumphant by removing the handicaps of price and weight, of fuel and upkeep cost. Most of the leading new models this season are in this Light Six class. There are 26 altogether.

Their makers are starting where HUDSON designers started four years ago. The ideals we propounded, the betterments we demonstrated, have become the accepted standards. This is the second time that a new HUDSON model has revolutionized the practice of the times.

We've Four Years' Start And 10,000 Endorsers

But we have been working four years on this car. We started two years before the first model came out.

We had Howard E. Coffin as chief of designing, and the foremost engineering corps in America worked with him. There were countless problems to solve, a thousand details to perfect. We had the time and the men to do it.

Now 10,000 Six-40's are running—5000 first-year models, 5000 of this. They are running in 43 countries. Together they have covered, probably, 25,000,000 miles.

The HUDSON Six-40 is an attained success. These cars for two seasons, meeting every condition, have answered all questions about it. When we state to you now that this car is right there are ten thousand men to confirm it. And that is true of no other Light Six.

Consult Your Neighbors

Wherever you are there are HUDSON Six-40's. There are men who have tried them out. Consult them. They will tell you that this is their ideal car, and offer their records to prove it.

That verdict, ten thousand times repeated, is bound to be your verdict, after equal tests. You can see today that in beauty and luxury, in lightness and equipment, this car has no rival in its field. And time will show you that it has none in staunchness, service and economy.

7-Passenger Phaeton, $1550 f. o. b. Detroit. Canadian Price, $2100 f. o. b. Detroit, Duty Paid. Four other styles of bodies.

HUDSON dealer service is ideal. It includes periodic inspection. And 800 of these service stations welcome HUDSON owners everywhere.

A WEEKLY ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER FOR THE HOME

WITH OUT-FLUNG ALARMS THE PANAMA-PACIFIC INTERNATIONAL EXPOSITION SPEAKS A WELCOME TO THE WORLD

THE WORLD TO MEET IN AMERICA

THE greatest of all world fairs opens in San Francisco on February 20 under extraordinary circumstances. The success of this mammoth exposition in the face of a world at the very opposite of that which the exhibition typifies will redound to the honor of American enterprise. This was to have been a peace city, in which the nations of the world would assemble for a year-long festival of good-will, exhibiting to each other the workmanship and art learning of their peoples, and discussing international and sociological world questions with the neighborliness and common interest that characterize our annual county fairs.

But the whole world is divided and has taken sides in the bitterest war of history. War, not peace, the spirit of the hour; international strife, not friendly competition, the spirit of the hour; race enmity, not common brotherhood, the spirit of the hour. Facing this condition, the Panama-Pacific International Exposition opens its doors to the world in typical American faith that by some remarkable turn of events the exposition will be the most successful of history, the bringer of peace to the world. After all, we are none of us advanced as races, when we stand face to face, as we are apt to think, not when apart.

Nothing is certain, if the world is to come to this exposition the world will be the loser. If the circumstances that accompany the opening of the exposition are extraordinary, the exposition itself is doubly so. Something like fifty million dollars are said to have been spent in the buildings and the immense number of exhibits. Congress authorized this fair as a national celebration of the completion of the Panama Canal, and partly financed the undertaking. California and her people have done the rest. And it is claimed that all preceding world exhibitions put together have been out of the point of magnitude and importance in this exposition, which will last from February 20 until December 4, 1915.

On October 14, 1911, President Taft inaugurated the construction of the fair in the presence of a multitude, the occasion being marked by addresses and various functions. Three years later the buildings were practically completed and the first exhibits began to arrive. The exposition covers six hundred and thirty-five acres devoted to the fair with a frontage of about two miles on San Francisco Bay and an average width of half a mile, a city of three wards. The western section reserved for state exhibits, both foreign and American. The central is devoted to the eleven exhibition palaces that contain the exhibits of industry, education, the arts, and social economy, and the eastern, called "the Zone," is devoted to amusement on a scale and of a character probably never witnessed before.

One aim of the architects has evidently been to make everything in the superlative, the "best ever" in exposition lines, the biggest, most beautiful, and best adapted to the purpose. The money and skilled labor and executive intelligence put into the enterprise have backed up this ambition. For example, the Palace of Horticulture has the largest glass dome in the world, 152 feet in diameter and 185 feet high; the vast Palace of Fine Arts, in which will be housed approximately five million dollars in art treasures, is constructed wholly of steel and concrete, and is fire and burglar proof; "the Zone" visitors a lasting impression of delight. But of course it is on the inside of these buildings that the world will be repaid for the trouble and expense of attending the exposition. Besides all our own states and territories, forty foreign countries will exhibit the best examples of their arts and industries and the most successful forms of their educational and civic systems. One of the most wonderful things about the exposition is the enterprise which could accomplish the bringing together of such an overwhelming wealth of exhibits. Some countries have been lavish in their official expenditures in order to make a worthy show. Argentina's appropriation for its participation amounted to $1,700,000, and its exhibit will include a very interesting live-stock display, besides representations of its churches and of its educational work. Canada appropriated some $600,000, China a million, little Siam a quarter of a million, Australia $400,000. And the figures run and still do not represent by any means the huge sums spent in behalf of the forty foreign countries, including the few that are not to be represented officially.

In addition to the exhibits of the very acme of the world's industrial and cultural progress, the exposition is going to afford opportunity for a discussion, before audiences representing all quarters of the earth, of practically every question of international interest. A permanent memorial auditorium has been erected in San Francisco at a cost of a million dollars, which seats ten thousand people; and conventions and congresses to the number of between three and four hundred have arranged to convene in that building during the year. These include agricultural societies, scientific, business, political, literary, religious and many other interests. It is intended by leaders in all these departments that the conventions shall be epoch-making in their effects upon international relations. Most interesting plans have long been under way for missionary conferences and exhibitions such as only an occasion of this kind could very well warrant.

There is no denying that the war in Europe will have its effect upon the exposition. Fortunately, the forwarding and installing of exhibits was well under way before the war could interfere. But as things stand today it is hardly to be expected that there will be any great influx of visitors from abroad to see how the wonders of their respective countries compare with those of other lands. The trans-Atlantic and trans-Pacific steamship lines for the present have to bear a grievous disappointment. This interruption of what promised to be a world represents an investment of ten million dollars for amusements, and is so immense in extent that reproductions of the Yellowstone Park and the Panama Canal are but incidents; the eleven great buildings occupying the central section are linked together with wonderful avenues and courts, small parks in themselves, and encircle a building called the Tower of Jewels, which rises 435 feet, and is covered with cut-glass jewels from Austria, to scintillate in the sunshine and in the special electrical illumination at night.

OUR main purpose," said Chairman Walsh of the Industrial Relations Commission in a recent interview, "has already been achieved. It was to bring home to the responsible—the employers living here in New York—the horrible conditions in the industries and their control in the far West. We have let employers tell just how much or how little they knew about the men on their payroll and how or how little interest they took in labor matters. We have let the workers tell from their lips why it is that they feel a spirit of estrangement and the leaders of labor, which was whose children were killed at Ludlow, testified, and one of the strikers wounded recently at Chrome, N.J.

Mr. Lawson declared that one cause of industrial discontent was the attempt which is being made to substitute philanthropy for justice. "It is not their own money," he said, "that these lords of commercialized virtue are spending, but the money withheld from the wages of the workingman." Enumerating some of the activities of the Rockefeller Foundation, which had been presented to the commission, he said: "A wave of horror swept over me during that reading, and I say to you that same wave is now rushing over the entire working class of the United States. Help for China, a refuge for birds, food for the Belgians, pensions for New York widows, university training for the elect, and never a thought or a dollar for the many thousands of men and women and children who starve in Colorado, for widows robbed of their husbands and children of their fathers by law-violating conditions in the mines, or for the glaring illiteracy of the coal camps. There are thousands of Mr. Rockefeller's ex-employees in Colorado today who wish to God they were in Belgium to be fed or birds to be cared for tenderly."

Referring to the proposed investigation of labor conditions by the Rockefeller Foundation Mr. Lawson said: "What is labor to do in the meantime? What is Colorado to do? In response to these questions Mr. Rockefeller says that 'the problem now is for all concerned to develop peace and good will.' Labor has been crushed by machine guns and hired soldiery. Men and women and children have died, homes have been ruined and futures blighted. Now thousands have been imported for another decade of exploitation, and we are to 'let bygones be bygones.' Mr. Rockefeller, Sr., is quoted as saying that God must be brought to New York. In Colorado there is a suffering multitude that asks only for a little of the spirit of the Christ who died for human brotherhood."

Mr. Lawson, too, objected to Mr. Rockefeller's plan for the election by the workers of representatives to confer with the company, insisting that if this plan was to have any good effect it must be backed up by the grant of the union to the men. Dr. Charles F. Eliot, president emeritus of Harvard, in his testimony took the ground that the General Educational Board and the Foundations under discussion were no menace to the public. He acknowledged that he had known many instances in which these educational boards have influenced the course of education, but declared that their influence had always been for the good. Dr. Eliot held that the stockholders of a corporation were not responsible for labor conditions unless their attention was drawn to them specifically. But he held that the members of a labor union were responsible for the decisions and activities of their executives. Mr. Amos Pinchot declared that the very cornerstone of the system of industrial exploitation is that the owners should keep themselves in ignorance of the actual acts of oppression by the managers. As to wages and living conditions in general and especially as to the tyranny of the company over the thousands of men and women who are depending on it, Mr. Rockefeller claims, and I believe his claim is true, that he kept himself in the most complete ignorance."

In regard to the influence of gifts from the Rockefeller and other Foundations to schools and universities, Mr. Pinchot said: "Nothing is more powerful and subtle than the influence of such donations upon institutions whose existence is largely dependent on donations."

J. Pierpont Morgan confessed before the commission, "I have no opinion on poverty." Asked if he thought ten dollars a week was sufficient pay for a longshoreman, he replied: "If ten dollars a week is all a man can get, and he takes it, I should think that was enough." He denied that a large part of the railroads of the country were under the control of his company and Kuhn, Loeb & Co.

Edward P. Costigan, counsel for the United Mine Workers in Colorado, said of the foundations:

"Philanthropy, as conducted from the beginning of the world to the present day, has been a barrier to the correction of economic wrongs."

"Certain conclusions from the analysis of the Rockefeller Foundation in its relation to the Colorado situation would appear to be warranted. One is that feudalism in industry should yield to democratic expression and participation among the workers if permanent peace is to prevail and social welfare is to be paramount. Another is that social, industrial and governmental justice are more important than charity."

in last week's account of the commission's session, was short-lived, for Mother Jones' statement to the press in which she declared Mr. Rockefeller's plan of allowing the board to meet for deliberation and declared that "good intentions are all right as paving stones, but what we want is performance." John R. Lawson of Colorado, member of the Executive Board of the United Mine Workers, although he had accepted the invitation to meet Mr. Rockefeller in his office, said that the conference was purely social and not official. He declared, testifying before the commission, "We rejoice after all these years Mr. Rockefeller is at last able to consider and confer with the workers. Many of our officials have despised and ignored and endeavored to crush. We welcome any and every conference, but these meetings should be aimed purposeful and not mere social visits, and to give the utterly false impression that industrial war has had no more vital cause than failure on Mr. Rockefeller's part to shake hands. As far as possible, the remedies must be equal and shall our great wrongs." Asked if he had ever had through any unpleasant experiences on account of his labor activities, the witness replied: "I have been followed by the gunmen and thugs of operators. I have been arrested and put into jail with carrying a gun, when I had no gun. I was shot in the streets of Newcastle in 1913, several little things like that." Later a mother,

NEW YORK PASTORS VISIT BILLY SUNDAY

TWO HUNDRED representative ministers of Greater New York went to Philadelphia on a special train on January 28 to attend the revival services held by Billy Sunday in the big temple. An ulterior object was to decide the question of inviting Mr. Sunday to New York for a great Gospel campaign. Eighteen months ago when no one's thought; today it is a fact. Pittsburgh raised the question; Philadelphia is pushing it home; New York is considering the decision. The first step in this direction was taken Monday, January 25, by the meeting of 400 ministers at the Mar-Congiate Church, New York, presided over by Dr. Charles L. Goodell, who voted favoring Mr. Sunday's visit to the metropolis lacked but one of being unanimous, and even the adverse voter was outside New York proper. Another important step was set down to this delegation in Philadelphia. The whole trip was a continuous session of discussion. The message was in the air. Dr. S. Ed-ward Young of Brooklyn, director of the train-load of clergymen, emphasized the point that they were not mere curious onlookers at the service; and Bishop Rush of the Reformed Episcopal Church told how easy it was to talk of religion to the man of the street.

The great afternoon tabernacle meeting was absolutely compelling in its impression. The vast area of the audience, the volume of the singing, the prayer by Dr. Goodell, the earnest two-minute speech by Dr. Young, the sermon by the evangelist from the words "Give ye them to eat," forceful in thought, phrase, and action, the handshake by Billy and Ma Sunday for each minister as they filed out, all made the day unforgettable.

On the return trip it was revealed that the evangelist had simply swept the judgment of every last man of the delegation to his side. This question was submitted to the men in each car: "In the event that there is a general desire to have Billy Sunday come to New York, are you personally in favor of his coming?" In each of the four cars, the "aye" vote was unanimous.

Dr. Young, who is pastor of the Bedford Presbyterian Church and who for many years was chairman of the Clerical Conference of the Federation of Churches, made this statement at the close of the trip:

"Here are, say, two hundred and more ministers of many creeds with whom I have been in conversation today. Preachers are peculiarly ready to express diverse opinions. To many of these I have said something like this:

"I want to know your inmost judgment on Sunday and his work—not what you might say under restriction, but freely as one man to another whom he trusts." The overwhelming fact is that all of these preachers have been absolutely unanimous in their declaration of perfect confidence in Billy Sunday, and of their conviction that he is being used of God, and that mightily. I am persuaded that every one of our spiritual leaders will endorse him just as heartily as I do, and as others do, when they come to see him as he is—a humble, consecrated, commonsense, brave man of God, who is burning to the socket for his Lord. Who cares about his slang, when he finds that slang is only a kind of hitching-on point for the multitudes who do not understand theological terms and possibly little appreciate classic English?"

Practically all the orthodox Christian bodies were represented in the delegation. There was a goodly show of clergymen of the Episcopal Church, and this was the deliberately worded judgment of Canon Chase: "Billy Sunday made a very favorable impression upon me. The oddities of his language, which have attracted hostile criticism, seemed to fade into insignificance under the glow of his intense sincerity. He has the right message. Those who helped to gather audiences for him will, in my opinion, assist in extending Christ's kingdom upon earth."

Mr. Sunday himself said, concerning the visit of the clergymen: "It was a fine representative delegation of New York ministers all right. That talk about not heeding a call from New York is all wrong. I have said before that if I can do the most good there I will come. It is up to the Lord. If he wants me to go, he will open a way, and he will appoint a time for my coming."

The delegation appointed Dr. S. Ed-ward Young chairman of a committee of twelve, with power to select others representing the main denominations, and four thus chosen were Canon William C. Chase, Episcopal; Dr. Malcolm J. McLeod, Reformed; Dr. John L. Clark, Congregationalist, and Dr. John H. Kerr, Presbyterian. It is probable that as the movement goes forward, this committee will be joined with the committee of which Dr. Goodell is chairman.

It would seem, as far as it can be anticipated, that Mr. Sunday will in the comparatively near future receive a call from the clergy and churches of Greater New York so complete and unanimous that he will have no disposition to decline it, and that very likely adjustments and careful months of preparation will be made so that he will conduct the New York campaign during the winter season of 1915-16.

HOW CHRISTIANITY HELPS US

A SERMON BY REV. JOSEPH A. SEISS*

"My daughter is even now dead; but come and lay thy hand upon her, and she shall live. . . . The woman said within herself, If I do but touch his garment I shall be made whole." Matt. 9: 18-21

TWO remarkable stories in one and the same paragraph, two wonderful restorations, two supreme instances of the power of true faith! They are so intertwined in the telling that they can hardly be disentangled. They are intertwined in the telling because they were originally intertwined in action. The stupendous question which presents itself to both the ruler of the synagogue and the woman with an issue of blood is, "To what extent can and ought and will Christ help me?" and the question so vital to them is equally vital to us. "To what extent can and ought and will Christianity help me?" Because of our indifference concerning this question, we have surrendered the citadel of faith to the rough, desperado spirit of men who have concealed themselves behind entrenchments of earth. We have surrendered a principle; we have been unwilling to fight a moral battle; we have succumbed to apathy in the realm of the spiritual. We do not deserve classification with the ruler and the woman!

Let us revert for a moment to the story. The dignified form of a ruler of the synagogue as he appears upon the threshold of an apartment in which publicans and sinners are feasting, is no whit stranger to the baffled banqueters than the presence of Christ in such an environment appeared to be to the carping critics drawn from the ranks of the Pharisees and Scribes standing without. Pharisees and scribes, publicans and sinners, these all fade from view, and the figures of the only Master of men and the ruler of the synagogue engage our attention. Our heart goes out to Jairus because he has left the bedside of a dying daughter. The symptoms, the verdict of the physician, the innate consciousness impress upon him, as he stands in the presence of Christ, the conviction, "My daughter is even now dead"; even now while I am speaking, there is no hope unless Christ be superhuman, unless he be divine. Yet there is a hope; for he is assured that though she be even now dead she may be, she will be reclaimed. "Come and lay thy hand upon her and she shall live."

Fear Not, Only Believe

This is his prayer. Leaving the happy circle of those whom he blessed with his presence, Jesus and the ruler lead the way homeward. Their progress is intercepted by a woman whose chronic illness has prompted her in faith to touch the garment of Jesus, who, realizing the outflow of power, turning, demands to know who it was that touched him. Peter, ever ready with an explanation, answers: "It must have been the multitude. See how people are crowding upon you. They can not help touching you." But Peter has not yet learned to distinguish between the strong rude contact of a surging mass of superficial, curious followers and the single, strong, yet humble touch of the believer seeking to be cleansed. Trembling with fear, realizing that she has been the cause of this commotion and delay, knowing that she has been discovered, the sick woman, a patient no longer, steps forth and acknowledges before all the people that it was she who touched his garments in response to the conviction that if only she do so she could be made whole.

The result put to naught the uncalled-for conjecture of Peter, astonishes the multitude and vindicates the faith of the ruler of the synagogue as well as the faith of the woman made whole. A word of commendation, not of rebuke, accompanies her as she retreats from view and is lost amid the throng. While Jesus is still speaking a messenger from the home of Jairus conveys the tidings surmised by the ruler and known by Jesus: "Thy daughter is dead, trouble not the Teacher." The compassion of the Saviour is thoroughly aroused. Turning to the ruler, he exclaims in words which can not be misunderstood, "Fear not, only believe, and she shall be made whole." The ruler trusts his Physician, Guide, Comforter. Jesus assumes the initiative and leads him to the house which is already being turned over to professional Oriental lamentation.

The Saviour's program has no place for these heathenish, superstitious symbols. He takes with him Peter and James and John into the now silent inner room. The word of power and life penetrates farther than the discordant sounds of empty rites. "Talitha kumi," (maiden arise). No empty form; not even a sacred committal of the body to the earth; but a recall of the spirit. The narrative concludes simply, "Her spirit returned and she rose up immediately."

The various elements in this story are important. As we read and reread the narrative, the lesson which stands out strongly for our age and needs is involved in the reasonings of the ruler of the synagogue and the woman seriously afflicted, a reasoning based on faith, faith based on a person and that person Christ. "To what extent can, ought and will Christianity help me?" is but a re-statement of the question put by two needy individuals reflecting upon their condition. Put the question in any other form you please: "Have I a right to expect anything from Christianity? Will it influence, mellow and transform my life? Is it worth while? Is it a good thing not only to die by but to live by as well? What must be my relationship toward it and its relationship toward me? Is it to be compared with the medicine in a vial in the medicine chest, which is to be used every day, or at regular intervals, or perhaps only occasionally as a tonic? or ought it to be compared with the air we breathe and without which we can not exist?"

Large Petitions with Thee Bring

There is no doubt at all that the majority of even so-called Christians employ Christianity as a drug, a useful thing for emergencies, rather than a preventive of sin and disease, a rule of life, the one eternal principle amid the crash and ruin of successive ages, empires and republics. The question, "To what extent can and ought and will Christianity help me?" is simply forced on us as the question to what extent Christ could help them was forced on Jairus and the invalid woman. It was forced on them by their recognition of personal helplessness, by the inadequacy of the human advice accorded them, and by their inward conviction of the adequacy, the sufficiency of Christ.

What was it for which the ruler asked? What did the invalid woman require? The ruler came to Christ only as a last resort. The various means near at hand were first tried, the suggested remedies were applied. He who was a ruler, a leader of the synagogue, surely did not allow his daughter to lapse into a comatose condition without having consulted the best and ablest physicians of his community, perhaps even those from abroad. It was only as a last resort that he appealed to the Master: "My daughter is even now dead, but come and lay thy hand upon her and—she shall live." The request was absolutely supreme. He did not ask Jesus to restore an invalid daughter. He asked him to raise a child from the dead. His petition demanded life.

The woman having an issue of blood twelve years, who, according to the testimony of Luke in the parallel account (and you will remember that Luke was himself a physician), "had spent all her living upon physicians, and could not be healed of any," came and touched the border of Christ's garment. Why? In order that she might once more be whole. Her reasoning is keen; her need is very great. What she needs is newness of life. Recognizing that her power is wellnigh spent, she demands of him who can supply it, power, life, happiness. Thus the ruler of the synagogue and the woman answer the question, "To what extent can and will Christ help me?" by indicating for us the measure of the request. To many of us the measure of the request is infinitely small. We approach Christianity with no definite understanding of its power to bestow. We need to be reminded:

Thou art coming to a King:
Large petitions within thee bring;
For his grace and power are such,
None can ever ask too much.

In coming to Christianity we have the right to demand and there rests upon us an obligation to demand life—physical, moral, spiritual life. This is to be the measure of the request. Physical life is granted to those who obey the mandates of our holy religion. "I beseech you therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, to present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable to God, which is your reasonable service. . . . They that are of the flesh have crucified the flesh with the lusts thereof." In such passages as these we are taught to recognize the high plane of Christian life. It has become in recent years to look upon the utter effectiveness of prayer in behalf of the sick as the prerogative of a sect. Christians have brought upon themselves because of the manner in which they have ignored the power of prayer physical life. The ruler's daughter lived anew in answer to prayer. Instances are recorded by and receive the commendation of a physician, and let it be remembered that this physician ministered to the great apostles—Paul, who in no wise rejected the power of prayer in the sick-room. The power of prayer in the sick-room must not be disallowed by the physician, the other hand the true Christian must dare not set aside as invalid the service whose knowledge of the body and of means for the restoration of the body is recognized throughout the Scripture. As the great Physician lives and practices as members of his staff he enlists physicians as ministers.

To what extent can and ought and will Christianity help me morally? The interplay of physical and moral assistance has already been mentioned. Personally, Christianity must help me in constructing my life. My life, however, is reconstructed unless the life of the community which I belong, the life of the nation of which I am a citizen, shall also experience a new birth. Christianity is not to preach politics, but Christianity will affect my politics. It will make of me a better citizen and it will make of the state a better state.

To what extent can and ought and will Christianity bring about a moral reformation? In accordance with the measure of my request, if my demands be large, the result will be large; if small the results will be meager. What is the measure of your moral demands? Tell me that, and I will tell you whether your Christianity is genuine or false. The reconstruction of the state, in accordance with moral standards, means new life for the state. The reconstruction of business, in accordance with moral standards, means new life for the world of commerce and of trade. Thus the measure of the request must be nothing less than a demand for a new moral life.

Thy Faith Hath Made Thee Whole

After all, the request of the Christian for a day seldom transcends the physical and moral and most clearly asserts its weakness in entering the spiritual realm. You may talk about sanctification all you please, cleanliness ever remains a godliness. It can not usurp its prestige. Unless we convene an international prison congress, a league late concerning an amelioration of conditions, unless the congress consist of men moved by the Spirit of God, it will fail in its purpose. We engage in an organized attempt to blot out a dread malady, but you will inevitably return to the conclusion that as long as there is sin in the world so long will there be sickness. Isaiah is right. Israel's wounds and bruises and sores are due to the fact that Israel is a sinful nation, "a seed of evildoers, children that are corrupters."

To what extent can and ought and will Christianity help me? It will lend unto me a new life which will renew me through and through. The raising of Jairus's daughter from the dead, the healing of the invalid woman, were not for themselves; they were means to a higher end. We all believe, we know without doubt, that the ruler and the woman obtained something more than physical and moral benefits. Spiritual life was imparted to them. "Thy faith hath made thee whole," may be predicated of the ruler as easily as it is told the woman.

To what extent can and ought and will Christianity help me? To the extent of the measure of my faith, to the extent of my ability to do things first, and to subordinate secondary things to the extent of my recognition of a force greater than my own, prompting, urging, inviting, all

Fully Occupied

UNDAY, February 21. Ephesians 4: 27. "Neither give place to the devil." We are near to leave a vacant place for the devil. He is always on the lookout for the empty unoccupied circumstance, in which he gets a foothold and begin his nefarious work. His safety is to fill everything with holy purification, to fill it so full of God that there is no room left for his foe. He delays the performance of a duty we are due to the devil. When we say to the Lord, "Suffer me first to—", we are giving the unfilled place to the devil. He delays of Christians, their dilatoriness, reluctance, their postponements and adjournments, because in the vacant hours he builds his abode. If my brother has aught against me, delay the rectification of the wrong, the wrong is gratified and embittered, for the devil has used it to extend his evil dominion. We do our duty half-heartedly we offer the half as a place for the devil. He loves the delay, for they always provide him a home. Offer only a room or two to the Lord, and he thrusts for himself. So that even our partial actions give him a foothold, and he uses it to test his boundaries. A maimed discipleship offers chances to the devil, and he leaps at the smallest chance. Give him an inch, he will work as though he had a mile, and a mile on will have! Give him an empty port, and he will have a country. Only let him land, he will never rest till his invasion is complete. J. H. J.

How God Helps Those Who Wait on Him

UNDAY, February 22. Isaiah 8: 9-20. "Surely there is no morning for them." Israel was in invasion on its northern frontier from the encroaching hosts of Assyria. There was anxiety as to the result. Many urged the idea of an alliance with some neighboring nation, whilst others turned for help to necromancy. The former, the prophet insisted that God himself be the sanctuary of his people; and with that, he urged the absurdity of seeking help from the present from those who had passed off their busy interests. "Should not a people inquire of their God?" If men need guidance amid problems and perplexities, let them obtain the law and the testimony—those oracles of which are God's great clue and guide through the perplexities of human life.

Those who deal with the spirits of the dead have no morning. They look to the earth and distress and darkness, or, as the prophet said, "the gloom of anguish." But when wait for the Lord, and look for him, a light in the darkness, and we find that his going is prepared as the morning. Only let us wait patiently, courageously, hopefully. The morning dawn on thee, sad heart, though thy night has long and sorrowful. Thy fears will not be vexed. Thy enemy shall not overcome. Thy bread be given thee and thy water shall be sure. The night, the pestilence that walketh in the night, the evil dreams that have haunted thee, be forgotten in the gladness of the perfect night of the dear Lord, who has been with thee all the while, though thou knowest not. The night breaks gradually. It is better so! But when it breaks, it goes on to the perfect day! F. B. M.

Jesus, the Master of Happiness

TUESDAY, February 23. Matthew 6: 17-18. "But thou, when thou fastest, anoint thine head with thy face; that thou appear not unto men as if thou didst." It was the custom among the Pharisees to make a parade of the things they suffered in the exercise of their religion. They were ostentatiously so; but if we may read between the lines, they were so fraudulently pious. Their religion also made them more or less miserable. It was hated especially upon its sorrowful and suffering side. We see suggestions of this type of religion in the Orient. We find wailings among Orthodox Jews in Tunis and all kinds of penitence, excruciatingly severe, among the Hindus, as in the Ganges. I found one poor man on the Ganges who had held his arm above his head as an act of penance so long that it was practically fixed in that condition. Another expressed his religious devotion by lying naked upon a bed of sharp spikes.

Medieval painters followed this dreary line of religion by picturing Jesus as the Man of Sorrows, of sad countenance, a kind of dejected and defeated saint. It is an awful caricature of Christianity, as far as possible from the real Christ of the Gospels, if he followed his own teachings, as we have every reason to believe he did. Even in your religious duties, like fasting and prayer, the Master would say, "Do not disfigure your faces and make long countenances, 'but thou, when thou fastest, anoint thine head and wash thy face.'"

Christianity should be an antidote for longfacedness and sad feelings. A prayer-meeting should not remind one of a funeral. Religion should cast about one an atmosphere of sunshine. The Japanese are taught from childhood to smile, whether or not they feel like smiling. It is not fair to others to advertise our sour feelings by dreary looks and dismal narration of ills. The flying of storm signals is not the true rôle of the Christian. It is better for him and for others that he annihilate his selfishness and self-pity and become an influence of uplift, rather than a drag upon humanity. "A merry heart doeth good like a medicine," says Solomon. I have no right to add my burdens to the world's woe. I shall today remember that any one can despair in trouble, but that it takes a brave Christian heart to sing in the rain. "These things have I spoken unto you," said the Master of Happiness, "that my joy might be in you, and that your joy may be full." C. S. C.

The Draught That Satisfies the Soul

WEDNESDAY, February 24. John 4: 1-14. "A well of water springing up into everlasting life." Two words are used in the Greek to denote the well beside which this memorable colloquy occurred. The woman spoke of it as "the pit"; Jesus as "the spring." There is a vast difference between these. The one, the hole in the ground; the other, the sparkling jet of water, rising from subterranean depths to quench the thirst of man and beast. The same difference obtains still in our views of religion. Some think of it as the pit to which they must wearily repair, day by day, as a matter of duty, dragging themselves through the same rites, repeating mechanically the same words, performing the same round of duties, much as a mule will pace round a well, turning the wheel. How hopeless such an experience is! It is religious drudgery!

It was not intended that this should be the normal experience of the believer. Jesus said that his life and love should be in the soul, like a spring or fountain, fed from the mountains of eternity, and ever seeking to rise again to its source. Let us so think, as we commence our private devotions, as we open our Bibles, or take our place among our fellow worshipers in the church or at the table. Let us not be content with the pit of the outward, but eagerly expect that Jesus will make it the vehicle and channel through which he shall pour his life and love into our thirsty hearts. "Give us thyself, O Lord. It is not by the bread and wine of the sacraments merely, but by thy flesh and blood, that our souls can be truly satisfied!" F. B. M.

No Real Happiness Without Righteousness

THURSDAY, February 25. Psalm 8: 4. "What is man, that thou art mindful of him? and the son of man, that thou visitest him?" The old Roman, Marcus Aurelius, once said: "Perceive at last that thou hast in thee something better and more divine than the things which cause the various effects and, as it were, pull thee by the strings. What is that now in thy mind? Is it fear, or suspicion, or desire, or anything of that kind?"

It becomes every individual to ponder upon this question of the psalmist, echoed by the old Roman philosopher. The physiologist will tell us of our bodily constitution, our heart-throbs and our changing physical atoms. The scientist and the historian can reveal to us the laws of nature and the accomplishments of the past. But the man himself must answer this deeper question for himself in his inmost consciousness: "What is man?" He knows, in his clearest moments, that, as Jesus said, the life is more than food. He also knows that what Carlyle called "things"—what money can purchase for him—are not capable of giving permanent and durable satisfaction to the human soul. Not even is his love entirely free from fears, cares and suspicions. There must have been something higher and purer than these things in the fundamental thought of the Creator when he said, "Let us make man in our own image."

This something is the power and satisfaction growing out of doing right. Righteousness is the eternal foundation of the human soul and human happiness. The chief end of life is to know what is right and to do it. There is hidden in our breast this instinct, this knowledge, that right is better than wrong; that no real happiness is possible without the sense of following after righteousness in both motive and act. This is our divine inheritance, our elevation over the beasts of the field, our sovereignty, our secret of happiness, our key to peace. Are we fearful, discontented, poor in this world's goods, without friends? Still, there remains to us the one great possession, giving a reason for existence, that which makes God mindful of us—the privilege and power of doing right. It is the choosing of that worth-while thing which one's central self chooses or selects regardless of present or future consequences, because it alone brings harmony and restfulness into one's life. The Joy of the Soul That Is "Sealed" to Christ

FRIDAY, February 26. Ephesians 4: 17-32. "In whom ye were sealed." Sealing means authentication. When Ahasuerus handed Mordecai his ring every one knew that the documents issued by the Jew premier were authentic and carried the king's authority. Thus the Holy Spirit authenticates us as true children of God and heirs of his eternal promises.

Here is an experience that may enable us to understand what this holy experience is. James Brainerd Taylor writes: "It was on the 23d April, 1822, when I was on a visit to Haddam, in Connecticut. Memorable day! The time and place will never be forgotten. For a long time my desire had been that the Lord would visit me, and fill me with the Holy Spirit—my cry to him was, Seal my soul for ever thine. I felt that I needed something I did not possess. At this very juncture I was most delightfully conscious of giving up all to God. I was enabled in my heart to say, Here, Lord, take me; take my whole soul, and seal me thine—thine now and thine for ever. All was calm and tranquil—and a heaven of love pervaded my whole soul. The name of Jesus was precious to me. He came as King and took full possession of my heart."

We may not have an experience precisely similar to this. The Spirit has many methods of making his presence known, but there is borne in on the consecrated soul a sweet consciousness that it belongs to God. The Dove settles down on its nest. The words we speak become invested with new power. There is a fellowship inaugurated with the Lord and with holy souls everywhere, which is our entrance into "the joy of the Lord." F. B. M.

He Can Fill Up the Little World of Our Wants

SATURDAY, February 27. Luke 12: 7. "Ye are of more value than many sparrows." In God's holy Word, he is the rock in a weary land, where springs of water are; a tower of defense; a covert in the tempest and a refuge from troubles. In nature he makes beautiful the flowers, feeds the ravens, cares for the sparrows, gives life to every creature, from the seraph to a butterfly. One of his steps means immensity; in his hands are upheld worlds, and suns and planets are controlled, as they sweep along their mighty orbits. All suns borrow their splendor from him. One smile of his face is light; one frown darkness. He knows no today nor tomorrow. Everlasting is his life and eternity his dwelling place.

Can you longer fear your Father's ability or willingness to fill up the little world of your wants? Can you not say, with the psalmist, "I shall not want, for the Lord is my Shepherd"? If "he opens his hand to supply the wants of every living thing," will he neglect you, the masterpiece of his workmanship, the child of his bosom? If he feeds the birds, will he leave his babes to starve in his earthly nursery? E. W. C.

BOSTON RECEIVES A MEDAL. The Anthony N. Brady gold, silver and bronze medals for safety record by an American electric railway were awarded this year by the American Museum of Safety to the Boston Elevated, General Bancroft, president, receiving the gold medal, Vice-President R. A. Sears the silver, and Henry V. Neal, mechanic, the bronze medal. The road carried 343,181,049 passengers over a total of 57,990,436 car miles run without one collision or fatal accident attributable to the road. The Safety First campaign in Boston helped in making this record, considered by the Safety Museum as the best in the United States for 1914.

PORTUGAL MAY REVERT TO MONARCHY. It is stated that the army of the Portuguese Republic has taken sides with the royalists as against the democrats and that the government has resigned, leaving the country to its fate.

FOR A FEDERAL CENSOR OF RELIGIOUS PRESS. The House Committee on Post Offices gave a hearing early in February to friends and foes of the pending congressional bills to exclude from the mails publications that attack the Catholic Church. Representative Fitzgerald of New York and Representative Gallivan of Massachusetts are responsible for the bills. Rev. R. W. McKim of Washington opposed the bills as being "inconsistent with the principles of American liberty," and advised libeled persons and institutions to apply to the courts. Mr. Gallivan declared that forty-eight Democrats were defeated in the recent election because of the literature complained of. An extended report of the hearing will appear in the next issue of the Christian Herald.

INVOLUNTARY THRIFT. According to Post Office Department figures on December 31, 1914, the 9,631 post offices handling savings accounts showed a total on deposit of $59,200,000 to the credit of 497,000 persons; about $10,000,000 of which has been deposited since the breaking out of the war by foreigners, apparently, who ordinarily would have sent their money abroad.

"RING, GRANDFATHER, RING!" On February 2, Senator Hitchcock of Nebraska, chairman of the Philippine Committee, reported to the Senate the Philippine Government bill, the preamble of which, as finally agreed upon in committee, provides for independence whenever in the judgment of the United States the Filipinos are ready therefor. The majority report states that there is urgent need for action on the bill, as longer delay would increase political agitation in the islands, and aggravate the present business depression there, due to uncertainty which prevents capital from entering on new enterprises.

ENGLAND'S FIRST WAR PARLIAMENT. When the British Parliament convened February 2 Premier Asquith secured the adoption of a resolution, said to be without precedent in England, to confine the session entirely to war measures, following the example of Canada and France; the general election, which should occur this year, may be postponed until the close of the war.

VIA PEKING. Three news despatches from China's capital state, first: The government has awarded $25,000 to the heirs of B. R. Hicks of Oskosh, Wis., who was killed on the Yangtze by river pirates; $20,000 to A. N. Sheldon, who was permanently injured, and $5,000 to P. Hofman, who was slightly injured, and is again in China, teaching, all three having been stationed at the Chinese College, Chengtu, at the time of the assault. Second: The new election law provides a ten-year term of office for the president (now Yuan Shi Kai) who, upon the expiration of his term, may be re-elected by a two-thirds vote of the Senate without a general election, if that body sees fit so to do. Third: At the first conference of the government to consider the territorial demands recently made by Japan no sign of yielding was apparent.

LOOKING FOR TROUBLE. The former German steamship Dacia, now flying the American flag under what is suspected is an invalid transfer of registry to American ownership, sailed from Galveston January 31 loaded with cotton consigned to Bremen via Rotterdam, . . . and what will happen to her now remains to be seen.

FOREIGN FLEETS RENDEZVOUS IN AMERICAN PORTS. Fifty-seven merchant steamers are now interned because of the war in ports of Continental United States, and nine others in Hawaiian ports; fifty-five of the total are German ships, eleven are Austrian. The list includes some of the famous ocean greyhounds such as the Vaterland and the George Washington. All these vessels had planned to bring thousands of tourists to this country for the San Francisco Exposition and the canal opening.

WERNER VAN HORN

EXTENDS WAR ZONE TO CANADA. Early in the morning of February 2 a German named Werner Van Horn, stopping at a hotel in the border town of Van Boro, Me., opposite St. Croix, New Brunswick, dynamited the Canadian Pacific railroad bridge over the St. Croix River on the Canadian side, with trifling damage to the structure, his avowed purpose being to interrupt transportation of munitions of war into Canada from Europe. The British Government promptly applied to the State Department at Washington for extradition of Van Horn, who has been placed under the charge of Vanceboro justice of the peace on the charge of causing damage to village property, buildings being some injured by the concussion. Van Horn telegraphed to the German embassy at Washington for aid in resisting extradition on the ground that his act was patriotic. The case has assumed international proportions. Van Horn, who claims to have acted without instruction from his government, cannot be delivered to the Canadian authorities without formal hearing in a court. An immediate outcome of the incident is the taking of extra precautions to guard the Canadian Parliament Building against similar attempts during the session which began February 4.

FREE SPEECH IN TEXAS IS COSTLY. At Marshall, Texas, on February 3, William Black, an ex-Catholic priest had lectured against the church the day before and was to speak again, was shot to death in a hotel room in the presence of his daughter and a visitor; the two men who made the attack was also killed and the other wounded, probably mortally.

FEELING OUR PULSE. The Washington Post states that the banking house of J. P. Morgan & Co. has a detachment of about 100 men organized to buy supplies for the British Government, in anticipation of American participation in England's war loan next July to the extent of $500,000,000, tingent upon a reversal of our government's view on the unneutral character of such loans to belligerents adopted when a French loan was proposed last year.

THE PRICE OF ANARCHY. It will be remembered that a large company of Hindus attempted to make a case of England's immigration policy, by insisting upon their right to enter Canada some months ago, being forcibly deported on the same steamer by which they arrived at Vancouver. The return of the steamer to Calcutta in October, the mutinous Hindus killed two police officials. Ten have now been sentenced to death as a final consequence of the adventure.

A FEW EXTENDED HEADLINES. Austria follows the example in taking control of grain crops upon the harvest: England is being urged to the same action by cities.—The House by vote of 261 to 136 refused to pass the Burnett Immigration bill over the President's veto.—The administration's ship-purchase bill appears to face a close vote in the Senate.—The French and Italian companies the Westinghouse Electric and Manufacturing Company of Pittsburgh will be sold outright to the British Warship Electric and Manufacturing Company, Ltd., of London, with majority stock held by the American companies. The output of these three European plants being for the United States to Germany. Two-cent postage rates from the United States to Germany suspended and five-cent rate fixed until restoration of transportation service.—New York City observed "Bundle Day" for the unemployed, and expects collection distribution will occupy two weeks.—Carranza in national trouble by threatening to deport the Spaniards at Mexico City unless an agent of the Spanish Government charged with active aid to Villa is surrendered. The cruiser Amasa wrecked off the western coast of lower California February 4, and American warship sent to rescue her crew of five hundred.

DAWES HOTELS TO DOT CITIES

CHARLES G. DAWES

WHEN Mr. Charles G. Dawes of Chicago a year ago opened the doors of the big hotel for the unemployed, which he had erected as a memorial to his dead son, Rufus F. Dawes, there were many who watched the experiment with interest to note whether such a venture could be made self-sustaining. As a result of the first year's experience it is now said to be pretty certain that a chain of similar hotels will be built in different cities by the Rufus F. Dawes Hotel Association. The money for the first few hotels has already been subscribed by Mr. Dawes and his friends, and the construction of new buildings will be started within a year. They may be located in New York, in Seattle or in Indianapolis.

The foundation on which the success of the Dawes Hotel rests—now and in the future—is that it is not in any sense charitable institutions. The guests pay for everything they get, and the hotel furnishes the money for the construction of new hotels are investing in a business enterprise which they believe will ultimately pay them 4 per cent cash and a much larger return in other ways. It is claimed that the first year's operation of the Rufus F. Dawes Hotel demonstrates the possibility of running such an enterprise as a pay-business proposition at a charge of not to exceed fourteen or fifteen cents a room, a comfortable bed and a substantial meal. Incidentally, it furnishes a lesson in the possibility of economical living, which should open the eyes of everybody in the country. For the year ending December 31, 1914, the Dawes Hotel sheltered a total of 100 guests. Almost every night during the year some of its 511 beds was occupied. During the year the hotel served 59,000 meals. To each guest service was rendered, with the lodging, the extent of a shower bath, with use of towel, comb razor, nightgown and slippers. The charge for a bed is five cents, with the exception of a few private bedrooms, for which the charge is ten cents. The bill of fare includes the following items, the charge for each being set out as follows:

Hot hash and beans.....	3 cents
Coffee, with milk and sugar.....	2 cents
Eggs.....	1 cent
Macaroni and bread.....	3 cents
Hot stew and bread.....	3 cents
Soup with bread.....	2 cents
Lightnuts.....	1 cent
Red beans and bread.....	3 cents
Hot, all varieties.....	3 cents

The first year's total operations show a net loss of $1,364.03, charged off for the year 1914, or about one cent per guest. The new Dawes hotels which it is proposed to build in different cities, enough will be added to the present charges to make up the loss on operation to cover a reasonable charge for depreciation, to pay taxes, etc., and to earn in addition four per cent annually on the money invested. On the basis of last year's statement, this will require an additional income of about $7,500. With 180,000 guests for the year's total, the additional tax on each will be a small fraction more than four cents each.

REGISTERING AT A DAWES HOTEL

Under the new arrangement the bill of a guest coming in for supper and a night's lodging might be itemized as follows:

For lodging.....	9 cents
For supper.....	6 cents
Total.....	15 cents

The purpose of the Rufus F. Dawes Hotel, according to its founder, Charles G. Dawes, is "to provide men with accommodations at reasonable figures." It is no different from any other hotel, except that its charges are lower. The management, proceeding on the idea that its guests are not to be considered as a class or a species or anything but American citizens, has succeeded beyond its expectations. No return was expected on the cost of the hotel, which was the gift of Mr. Dawes, as a memorial to his son.

There are no rules in the hotel different from ordinary hotels, save those relating to sanitation. All the lodgers take a shower bath before going to bed. When getting their beds assigned, each of the unemployed is given a key to a locker which corresponds in number to that of the bed. The hundreds of steel lockers are in the great room in the basement. In this room the men take off their day clothes, put them into the lockers and take from the lockers clean nightgowns and slippers. From the locker-room the men go to the bathing-room. Each man is furnished with soap and a fresh towel as he goes into the washroom. After he has taken his shower bath, the man is ready for bed. He goes to a clean bed, a condition which in no way detracts from his self-respect. For extra cleanliness, the hotel lends its guests safety razors and other shaving utensils for which no charge is made. A twenty-five-cent deposit is required, which is paid back when the razors are returned. Hundreds of the guests take advantage of this offer. They are thus enabled to present a good appearance when they go to hunt for work. Further, to preserve the self-respect of needy lodgers, the management has furnished for them hotel stationery similar to that in hotels where the prices for accommodation are many times greater. This enables the men to write to their families without conveying the idea that they are staying in a "dump" or a "flop."

The main entrance leads directly into a large tiled rotunda and reading-room, furnished with scores of comfortable chairs. At the south end of the rotunda is a big fireplace in which, on cold nights, logs are kept merrily burning, and before which groups of men sit and tell of their hunt for employment. At the left of the fireplace is the reading-room. At the east center of the rotunda is the caged hotel office, where the names of all lodgers are taken, where the keys are given out, and where strip tickets for the restaurant, worth a penny each, are sold. Off from the office are the rooms of the manager of the hotel. Leading off the rotunda is the first sleeping floor, containing upward of one hundred beds. The floor above is filled with one hundred and thirty-five comfortable iron cots. On these two floors the beds are five cents each. There are toilet and water-drinking arrangements on each floor. The rooms are well lighted and perfectly ventilated. On the third floor there are one hundred little separate sleeping-rooms, called "cubicles."

The hotel is not designed to be a permanent home for workingmen, but is planned as a temporary home for men who are out of work. They are welcome as long as they can find no employment, but are supposed to give up their beds when they find work at proper pay and thus make room for others less fortunate. There are many laborers in the city who would be delighted to make the hotel a permanent sleeping place, for it is so far ahead of other lodging houses in the city it a palace in comparison.

WHEN POLLYANNA WAS EXPECTED

Belleville was fairly aquiver with excitement. Not since Pollyanna Whittier came home from the sanatorium, walking, had there been so much chatter of talk over back-yard fences and on every street corner. To-day, so, the center of interest was Pollyanna. Once again Pollyanna was coming home—but so different a Pollyanna, and so different a home-coming! Pollyanna was twenty now. For six years she had spent her winters in Germany, her summers leisurely passing with Dr. Chilton and his family. Only once during that time had she been in Belleville, and then it was for but a short four weeks the summer she was sixteen. Now she was coming home—to stay, report said; she and her Aunt Polly.

The doctor would not be with them. Six months before the town had been shocked and saddened by the news that the doctor had died suddenly. Belleville had expected then that Mrs. Chilton and Pollyanna would return at once to the old home. But they had not come. Instead had come word that the widow and her niece would remain abroad for a time. The report said that, in entirely new surroundings, Mrs. Chilton was trying to seek distraction and relief from her great sorrow.

Very soon, however, vague rumors, and rumors not so vague, began to float through the town that, financially, all was not well with Mrs. Polly Chilton. Certain railroad stocks, in which it was known that the Harrington estate had been heavily interested, had tumbled into ruin and disaster. Other investments, according to reports, were in a most precarious condition. From the doctor's estate little could be expected. He had not been a rich man, and his expenses had been heavy for the past six years. Belleville was not surprised, therefore, when, not quite six months after the doctor's death, word came that Mrs. Chilton and Pollyanna were coming home. Once more the old Harrington homestead, so long closed and silent, showed up-flung windows and wide-open doors. Once more Nancy—now Mrs. Timothy Durgin—swept and scrubbed and dusted until the old place shone in spotless order.

"No, I hain't had no instructions to do it; I hain't," Nancy explained to curious friends and neighbors. "I hain't had the key, 'course, and I hain't come in regerlar to air up and see that things was all right; and I hain't Miss Pollyanna was comin' this week Friday, and ter please see that the rooms and sheets was aired, and ter leave the key under the side-door mat on that day."

"Under the mat, indeed! Just as if I'd leave them two poor things ter

George Washington

WASHINGTON'S birthday again! Most of us will celebrate it by staying home from school or from work, and planning a day of pleasure. We may attend some patriotic service or a supper, and the day will add one more item to our pleasant memories of the life of the father of our country.

This year suppose we add at least one new number to our Washington Day program. Take down the cyclopedia volume containing the "W's" and look up George Washington.

We can promise you half an hour or an hour of solid pleasure if you will read what your encyclopedia has to say about George Washington. Both the parts you have forgotten and the parts you remember will delight you. You will be glad to get the renewed information and pleased at remembering the old. You had forgotten his commission as major of militia and adjutant general at twenty-one; his honorable defeat by the French and Indians at twenty-two; his appointment as commander of all the forces of Virginia at twenty-three. You remember his earlier life as a surveyor and his later experience of rescuing Braddock's army after that general had been defeated and slain because he would not take the young American's advice. You remember his appointment as commander-in-chief of the armies of the colonies; you have forgotten the details of his hard campaigns of the Revolution. Read them again—up to Cornwallis's surrender. Read again his address to his officers who threatened to coerce Congress and perhaps change the form of government because their pay was not forthcoming, shaming them out of their treason and back to stanch loyalty. Read how, in his letter of farewell as commander-in-chief to the governors of the states, he urged upon them the abandonment of local jealousies and ambitions, a firm support of the Union, and a "sacred regard for public justice." Read his career as the Union's first President, his patience and courage in the face of opposition, his refusal to accept a third term in office, his farewell address, urging upon the people the claims of unity, non-partisanship, religion and education, and warning them against "entangling alliances with foreign states."

Washington was indeed great in peace, as well as in war. We regret the necessities that compelled him to take the sword, while we are grateful for what that sword made possible for us. We rejoice that our country's career has been so largely a career of peace. We hope that peace may be ours throughout the future years. We dedicate ourselves again, as we face the problems and tasks of the present and the future, to the principles for which he stood—liberty, justice, piety, education, to be defended and achieved by fidelity, patience, and courage.

The Pope and the War

AN article which appeared in the New York Times of January 31, "A Veteran Diplomat" discusses the probability of the Pope becoming peacemaker in the present war. He writes that Great Britain's appointment of a special embassy to the Pope, headed by Sir Henry Howard—the first appointment of the kind since Tudor days—is being followed by one from the Mikado to the Vatican. In Rome, and especially in ecclesiastical and political circles, he says, it is reported that "even the President of the United States is about to send a special embassy to the Eternal City, for the purpose of cooperating with the Pope in his efforts to prepare the ground for the restoration of a just and lasting peace." Thanks to his statecraft and diplomacy, Benedict XV has already succeeded in securing his assistance by all the belligerent powers as a friendly intermediary. Thus far his good offices have been restricted to an arrangement for the exchange of all wounded prisoners of war, and of those incapable of bearing arms." He further points out that, for the first time since the rupture of diplomatic relations more than a decade ago, telegrams of the most friendly nature have passed between the Pontiff and the President of France. So general and cordial, he declares, have been the responses from all the powers that the conviction is growing in Rome and elsewhere that the Pope is destined to become "the principal intermediary in all the negotiations among the warring nations looking toward peace."

This writer, who professes throughout to speak with the authority of intimate knowledge, adds that German statesmen and the German press have openly declared that they would not accept the United States in the rôle of peacemaker. One of the leading journals, the Cologne Gazette, recently stated very plainly that it would be foolish for Germans to accept America in that rôle, as our neutrality, while strict, "has been more favorable to Great Britain and France than to Germany." Austria would object to Italy, even if the latter did not enter the war, and both Germany and Austria would regard Spain as disqualified, her neutrality having been friendly to the Allies. There is thus left only the Vatican as the sole suitable and acceptable intermediary.

"Veteran Diplomat" recalls the precedent for a special mission from the American President to the Pope, when President Roosevelt in 1902 commissioned Mr. Taft, then governor-general of the Philippines, to go to the Vatican, where he assisted in the settlement of the dispute over the title and ownership of the lands held by the Catholic religious orders in the Philippines under Spanish rule. On that occasion, he informs us, Mr. Taft made "a most favorable impression at the Vatican, where he remains to this day persona grata." Mr. Taft's relations with Rome, and especially the part he played in the Philippine land settlement, are not recalled with satisfaction by Americans generally.

Although the Papacy no longer retains its former territorial possessions, "Veteran Diplomat" says, it still ranks as one of the sovereign European states, while the Pope himself is looked upon as a full-fledged sovereign. As a great world-power, our government can afford, like Germany, Russia, Japan and Britain, he argues, to send a special embassy to the Vatican, especially when the matter is one of such importance, involving world-peace. The rôle of mediator, he assures us, is almost always an ungrateful one, and it is well-nigh impossible to satisfy the various conflicting interests. Therefore, we are left to assume, it would be well for us to avoid it.

The whole argument in "Veteran Diplomat's" article is skilfully set forth with the obvious purpose of reconciling the American mind to a situation which contemplates the fullest recognition of Papal influence in international affairs. The reasoning is subtle and apparently conclusive. General acceptance of the Pontiff as mediator would be hailed by Catholics everywhere as an unprecedented triumph, and an overwhelming recognition of the claims of the Vatican to spiritual and temporal sovereignty. The Protestants of England vainly opposed the appointment of a British commissioner to the Vatican. Would a similar protest from American Protestantism be heeded, or would President Wilson—who, like his two predecessors, has given all too generous recognition in the same quarter—fall into line and appoint an American commissioner to aid in restoring the lost influence of the Papacy over the destinies of Europe and the world?

This war is making history on a gigantic scale. Now the Papacy sees an opportunity to regain its lost prestige and to rebuild its decayed fortunes. Its hopes may be rudely shattered when the crisis comes, for peace can be concluded without seeking the services of the Vatican. But it is playing for high stakes, with marvelous skill and adroitness, and its triumph would be all the greater if by diplomatic craft it could persuade Protestant America to become one of the tails to its kite. This is the situation the Administration will probably be forced to face. If the desires of the vast majority of the American people are consulted, there would be no doubt as to the character of the response.

The "Mighty Dollar" Again

THERE are two sets of joint resolutions looking to the facilitation of world-peace before Congress at the present time. Both are in the hands of a committee, where they seem likely to remain. Why these measures are not submitted for discussion is very clearly explained by a member of the U. S. Senate in a recent letter to an inquiring constituent. The senator wrote:

"I am in hearty accord with you. The trouble, however, is that with this, as with almost everything else, the mighty dollar stands in the way of progress and reform. The spectacle of the United States sending a shipload of food and clothing to the orphaned and widowed people of Europe and, at the same time, sending a shipload of guns and ammunition to make more orphans and widows, is one of those grotesque spectacles that we sometimes find. Again, there is so much money invested in the making and sale of arms and munitions of war that to this time we have simply been power anywhere with the bill. I regret this, in condition that exists, much as you and I regret it."

It would be difficult to describe the attitude of this nation more tersely and than has been done in the senator's reminder quoted above. It is a humiliating condition money rules us, and that when great interests are involved, all other considerations give way. But is it an absolutely true picture? hesitate to believe that there are not enough men of conscience, courage and conviction put the question successfully to the test when opportunity comes.

"Have Faith in God"

PEACE came when I stopped replying to prayers and trusted him." This sentence from a letter to the Prayer League contains volumes of spiritual truth.

Faith is a simple matter, but we are constantly in danger of letting something come between us and God. Rather, we have faith in something other than God. Often when a prayer is unanswered, we say: "I prayed earnestly for that. Why didn't it come?" Our faith was in our prayer rather than in God. Sometimes we have faith in our own thinking: "Because I am believing for this thing, it will surely come." But it does not come. Our faith is not get beyond self; beyond our own praying, our own believing.

Can we not see that so long as we keep asking for a blessing our very asking is an acknowledgment that it has not yet come? Why should we for a thing that has been put into our hands? We are praying and making the effort to believe, our thoughts are on self, and on our needs. This praying and this believing are usually necessary to bring us to the place where our souls are receptive of God's bounty. But when the blessing comes, are not thinking of self, or needs, or prayer, but of his vast bounty and kindness. It is a cry:

All my trust on thee is stayed,
All my help from thee I bring, that the blessing descends. We sing:

Since my eyes were fixed on Jesus
I've lost sight of all beside.

Then we wonder that we could have kept praying so long instead of taking; we wonder that we could have made such desperate efforts to believe instead of restfully and quietly trusting.

The Rising Cost of Bread

IT IS a serious situation that confronts the nation when, with a wheat crop of 89,000,000 bushels—nearly 130,000,000 more than the previous record and far in excess of our needs—we find the price of bread soaring as though we were famine in the land, instead of abundance. It is true, we have been exporting wheat to Europe at the rate of nearly a million bushels daily for months past; but our normal surplus being doubtful this year, gave us an ample supply for home needs, and 300,000,000 bushels for export besides. Yet the flour mounting week by week until it has nearly touched $8 per barrel, almost double the cost of a year ago. Bakers have raised the price of loaves and rolls, and to the working class the staple of life is becoming a luxury. In many places a government embargo on grain exports is being urged to prevent an actual bread famine. Investigators are busy in a few localities; but in the larger cities the situation ordered by the federal authorities is accomplished. Meanwhile the popular protest against this needless extortion is unheeded and the speculators are reaping a rich harvest. The point to the law of supply and demand as it is being the unprecedented rise in prices, and we declare that they will go higher. It is clearly for which there is no adequate legal provision, such rapacity promptly and effectively. The values in grain have afforded an opportunity for speculation which is already oppressing the American home to an extent that threatens to become serious if permitted to go on. Provided we send us bountiful harvests, but the unholy greed has grasped the gift that belonged to the people and selfishly turned it to personal advantage.

The BIBLE and NEWSPAPER

CONDUCTED BY
FERDINAND C. IGLEHART, D.D.

Had Oriental Divination Night

A NUMBER of persons prominent in New York society assembled at the home of one of the wealthy members the other night, and Oriental divination exercises were held, acted by the diviner, a native of Tokyo, Japan. They were arranged in the drawing-room, facing a table of Oriental design, behind which a screen from the Mikado's empire. Between the screen and the modern prophet, wise in the soothing knowledge of four thousand years ago. Men and letters and women too were gathered around the oracle's table. The professor wore a costume, and from time to time told what the cards of the Orient had to say, or read in the arrangement of queer slender little sticks, which stood like arrows in a wooden jar of design. This meeting was but an expression of the native desire to pry into the future and its secrets. There is one book which solves every thing—the Bible. Its prophets did see and tell of its Messiah, who came in answer to the need, alone can solve the riddle of life and the future. He "hath brought life and immortality to light through the Gospel." They had soothsayers in the East, some of whom were popular and made a fortune out of their calling. It was one of these who came after Paul and for whom he cast out an evil spirit to whom this reference is made: "A certain woman possessed with a spirit of divination, which brought her masters much gain by soothsaying." (Acts 16: 16.)

Hen Lays 3,000 Eggs

MISS SIELSIE DOBBINS, of Caldwell, N. J., is the owner of a hen which she believes holds the world's record for industry. The hen is four years old, and on January 27 laid her 3,000th egg. The bird, which is a Plymouth Rock, was hatched in 1901 and presented as a chick to Miss Dobbins on her third birthday. An exact record of every egg laid was kept. They call her "Old Reliable" on account of her certainty as an egg-layer. This fowl laid 250 dozen eggs, worth all together from $100 to $450. What a lesson of tireless industry is here! How many men and women of this humble creature made strong for daily duty; may weak persons she helped into health! "Old Reliable" never lived a moment for herself, always ready for others, to lay down some value for the benefit and life of others. The egg was a special article of diet among the Hebrews, as we learn from Christ's question: "Or if he shall ask thee a gift, will he offer him a scorpion?" (Luke 11: 12.)

Ambulance Dogs on Battlefield

THE Kaiser's canine conscripts, the "Sanitäts-hunde," or ambulance dogs, have proved such credit in the West, where they have been employed several months, that by order of the military command the number attached to each ambulance company is to be increased to eight, while at the urgent request of Field Marshal von Hindenburg 20 additional dogs have been sent to the front. The commander of the dog division gives a description of the relief work done: "At seven o'clock in the evening we started for the battlefield. We were already eagerly awaited by our grievously wounded companions. The enemy had been driven back to miles. It was a pitch-dark night, with a heavy fog. At the command: 'Hunt the enemy!' the dogs dashed ahead into the woods, followed them as rapidly as possible, to prevent the enemy from working too long, and drawing the enemy's fire. We heard the barking and ran in the direction of the sound; we met the dogs coming back to us and they took us to one poor fellow, who said, 'For God's sake, help me and give me a drink of water.' I gave him coffee from my flask and put him on a stretcher and had him taken back. We passed on to the new barking, and in an all-out march on that battlefield in those dark woods, the men were rescued, most of whom would have been found without the dogs and would have perished by morning." From the military journal at Bonn a member of the engineer corps tells the following testimonial to the ambulance dogs: "I was wounded in the ankle, and with several other wounded comrades hid in the cellar of a small village. We were locked in by our machine gun who let streams of water into the cellar to drown us. For three days and nights we stood up to our breasts in water without a morsel of food. We gave up all hope of being saved, when a dog put his head through a hole in the cellar wall, as he had scented us. The captain took off the cover of his helmet and stuck it into the collar of the dog, who ran away, and in about four hours returned with the ambulance men, who released us. But for that merciful dog we should all have died." The dogs of Palestine must have been different from those in the world nowadays or they would not have been employed as the symbol of everything that is mean and despicable. Christ in the parable makes this mention of the merciful ministry of dogs, as contrasted with the hard-heartedness of an avaricious man: "And moreover the dogs came and licked his sores." (Luke 16: 21.)

PRESIDENT WILSON'S FIRST GRANDSON

THE birth of Francis Sayre, the first grandson of President Wilson, in the White House has attracted national attention, as the brilliant wedding of the baby's parents did. The press has described and the cameras have pictured the keen delight of the President at the advent of the child. The White House has mirrored the shifting scenes of life; now it has been fragrant with the odor of the orange bloom; now saddened with the nightshade and the cypress, and again bright with joy at the cradle, and its bundle of love and life and hope. President Wilson has set an example to the nation in his ideal family life as husband, father, and grandfather. These family virtues from the White House to humblest cottage are the sure foundation-stones of the republic. A little newsboy of Washington called at the White House the other day. He had on his Sunday clothes. The attendant asked him whom he wanted to see. He said, "The President." He was told he could not see him, and asked what he wanted to see him about. He replied "Sayrie." "Who is Sayrie?" the man asked. The boy replied, "The baby that was born here. I am taking names for new members of the Young Men's Christian Association, and I wanted the kid on my list." "We call him Sayre, not 'Sayrie,'" the official smilingly corrected, at the same time telling the boy the matter would be laid before the President. To the beauty of babyhood there is added the lovely picture of the little newsboy's affection for Christ, and zeal for his cause. Francis Sayre will be early taught affection for and obedience to the Babe that rules the world, not born in the palace of a ruler, but in a manger, where his discovery by the shepherds is thus described: "And they came with haste, and found Mary, and Joseph, and the babe lying in a manger." (Luke 2: 16.)

Couple Married by Proxy

THROUGH a special dispensation by Queen Wilhelmina of Holland, Miss Eugenia Campbell of Colorado Springs was married in Denver by proxy January 21 to John Pieter Scholten, a young Hollander, located in Samarang, Java. A similar ceremony was performed simultaneously in Samarang, 10,000 miles away. Henry V. Deuell substituted for the groom here, a young woman in Java for the bride there, and officiating ministers, bridesmaids, best man and attendants were present at both ceremonies. Then the bride started on her long journey to stand side by side with her groom and be joined to him by a more elaborate ceremony. Miss Campbell is a granddaughter of the celebrated Alexander Campbell, the religious leader and founder of the Campbellites. She met Mr. Scholten, manager of a coffee plantation in Sumatra, who had come to Colorado Springs for his health. They were to have been married in Holland in December, but the war changed their plans. The Dutch immigration laws so hedged up the landing of unmarried women in Java that a special dispensation was granted, permitting the marriage by proxy, and the Dutch minister at Washington was authorized to issue the papers. Civil and religious ceremonies are necessary, but real marriage is of the heart, growing out of mutual respect and affection that will not permit supreme happiness when separated from each other. This blessed joining of two human hearts as one is used as a type of the intense affection of Christ for the church and his divine union with it. "Come hither, and I will show thee the bride, the Lamb's wife." (Rev. 21: 9.)

Boy Receives Important Patent

JOSEPH CAMPBELL, of Plattekill, N. Y., a boy eighteen years old, has invented a device to prevent the spreading of steel rails, which causes so many railroad accidents. A patent has been granted to him and it is said that one of the transcontinental railroad lines has offered him a handsome sum for the exclusive use of the patent rights and that he has declined it. There are two commendable things about this event: first, the boy's mental insight and painstaking application, so necessary to success in any efforts in life. The other is the splendid service rendered to his fellow men in avoiding accidents and thereby preventing pain and loss of life. There are perils all along the road and the wreckage that follows in the mental, moral and spiritual realm. How beautiful to remove these dangers and preserve the highest life of the soul in imitation of Him who said: "I am come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly." (John 10: 10.)

Donate Salaries to Harvard

WHEN it was learned that there was a deficit in the current expenses of Harvard University, President Lowell and a number of the wealthy professors turned their year's salaries back into the treasury, and other professors donated a portion of their salaries to the deficiency. This is a fine spirit of consecration to the cause of higher education, recognizing this value put upon wisdom: "She is more precious than rubies: and all the things thou canst desire are not to be compared unto her." (Prov. 3: 15.)

Employer Saves Laborer's Life

A CONTRACTOR was building an important bridge over a river in New Jersey. He went down to see how the hands were getting along with their work and to give some special instructions. While there one of the workmen missed his step and fell into the river, whose rapid current was bearing him swiftly away. The contractor saw the man sink, unable to swim, and throwing off his overcoat and coat plunged into the river and swam rapidly to where the man was in the last act of drowning. He seized him and with great effort swam with him back to the bridge, where both of them were fished out. The large force of hands building the railroad bridge were so greatly impressed by the modest heroism of their rich and influential employer that they called a meeting privately, took up a subscription and called at his mansion to present a medal to him, expressing their appreciation of the deep interest he had always taken in his men and of his heroic act in saving one of their number from death. The man was surprised and overcome with emotion at their action. The usual story of rescue from drowning is that a well-to-do person falls into the water and some little wharf-rat, or deck-hand, or tramp, or humble citizen, leaps into the water and saves him. Instances of this kind of bravery are numerous among this humble class of people. But there is real heroism also among the cultured and influential. Labor troubles would be reduced to a minimum if the spirit manifested by this contractor toward his men and that of the men toward their employer were to prevail generally and if the representatives of capital and labor were to ask devoutly this question: "Am I my brother's keeper?" (Gen. 4: 9.)

WHAT A ZEPPELIN BOMB DID AT KING'S LYNN, ENGLAND

TROOPS ON SKIS ARE A NEW FACTOR IN THIS WAR

THE WAR IN EUROPE

BY ANTHONY ARNOUX

European journalist of many years' standing; military critic; staff writer of the Paris Daily Mail and Le Temps; contributor to l'Indépendance Belge

OUT of all the various items of the week's news, those relating to two general subjects seem to be of the most importance, and will be treated first. These are the measures adopted by Germany to meet the British effort to starve her out, and the newly inaugurated aggressive campaign in the Carpathians by Germany and Austria against the Russians.

The measures taken by Germany to meet the English threat of starving her out are both offensive and defensive. The offensive is a strike at Great Britain's coastwise and overseas commerce by submarines, and the "blockade" of the entire British Isles planned by Admiral von Tirpitz against the British merchant marine has opened in grim earnest. Germany has also proclaimed a war zone around Great Britain after February 18.

In two days last week, in two widely separated portions of the water surrounding Great Britain, five merchant vessels were sent to the bottom by German submarines. The vessels so sunk were none of them of great importance in themselves, but the inauguration of such a policy of systematic destruction of merchant ships, and the power evidenced to strike with submarines a thousand miles from any conceivable base of operations, are of the highest interest and importance.

Three of the vessels destroyed were sunk only a few miles from Liverpool in the Irish Sea, and more than 1,000 miles from any German naval port. It is a great puzzle how, in view of the limited cruising radius of a submarine, it was possible for one to get to this point and threaten the commerce of one of the greatest of the English ports. Another submarine, later in the week, appeared off Havre, France, well to the south in the English Channel, and torpedoed and sunk two more British ships, the Tokmar, coming from New Zealand, and the Icaria.

It will be noticed that both of the scenes of action are located at points on the seas surrounding Great Britain, which were supposed to be absolutely in the control of the allied fleets. The torpedoing near Havre will cause troops to be sent from England by this route only with the greatest caution and under very strong escort.

The newly launched Austro-German offensive is both important and interesting. Its scene is the Carpathian Mountains, which reach in a wide-spreading arc from Pressburg on the Danube, near Vienna, to Orsova, also on the Danube, opposite Rumania, a stretch of about 800 miles, forming a natural boundary for Hungary east and north of the Danube. While not of great average height as mountains go, at a point almost directly south of Cracow they attain an altitude of between 8,000 and 9,000 feet, while for the rest of the chain 5,000 to 7,000 is the maximum. Their width varies from seven to more than 200 miles, the greatest width coinciding with the greatest height. Nowhere in the chain does the snow lie perpetually.

The Galician side of the mountains is steep and craggy, while toward the south they fall away in lesser mountain groups and broken, sloping plateaus. Galicia, to the north, slopes down in terraces from the Carpathians and contains many marshy plains and bogs, becoming very flat toward the Russian border. Among its population are many Jews, who own most of the inns, taverns, shops and domestic animals. The most considerable part of the population are Poles.

Almost equal in numbers to the Poles are the Ruthenians, who differ materially from the Poles in language, religion and political views, and with whom there is much friction. These Ruthenians are among the most miserably poor and squalid trayed the movements of the Austrian on possible occasions.

As the Carpathians and the province are apparently about to be the center of it seems fitting to give the above small the geographical and other conditions there may be helpful.

A large Austro-German army, variously estimated at from 300,000 to 1,000,000—the last palpably an exaggeration—has recently assembled in Hungary south of the Carpathians. During the last week has been advancing through the mountain passes of Hungary and Transylvania with Galicia as its goal, out of which in several cases they have been successful in driving the Russians.

At the present writing they are in the process of coming out of the mountains and attacking the Russians on the plateaus on the northern side of the mountain chain, with the avowed object of capturing the besieged fortress of Przemyśl, and also of driving the Russians out of the town of Lemberg, the largest place in Galicia, which fell into Russian hands some time ago.

The fighting in the Carpathians was a working-in operation. The Austrians gained some ground in Bukovina, and advanced in the passes between Hungary and Galicia, while in Galicia itself they have taken a point eighty miles north of Przemyśl, which represents a gain of importance.

While this movement was made from the south, rather than the offensive movement being launched from the west from the Tarnow-Sanec line, it is a part of the whole movement. The maximum pressure is being applied to the Russian line across Poland from Tarnow to Sanec. These three apparently separate campaigns are really one, and now seems as though the Russian moment in the Easter campaign would occur within a few weeks.

The campaign in Poland is the third element in the Eastern campaign, and has been in a waiting attitude most of the week. In the south there has been some fighting on the Pilica River, and in the center at Borjow the German made a thrust in advance in the direction of Warsaw. North of the Vistula there has been a cavalry skirmish at Mlawa and Lipine, and the alleged Russian offensive against Thorn, which in reality is a feint to relieve the pressure on the south of the Vistula. Another Russian offensive white people in the world. The province is rich in corn, wood, salt and petroleum, but lacks industries.

The presence of this Ruthenian population in such large numbers has been a greater difficulty for Austria than the Russian army, since they are almost without exception devoted to the Russian cause or religious and racial groups, and have be-has been launched farther to the north against Königsberg and Tilsit. This appears to be more serious than the offensive against Thorn, as it is supported by a greater force. Fierce fighting has been going on all the week near Gumbinnen and in the forests to the north, and the Russians appear to have made some progress. Gumbinnen, where they now are, is seventy miles from Königsberg and that town is defended on the east by Dreime-Oal, which will take some negotiation, and then farther to the east, reaching nearly to Insterburg, is a striking natural defense of some fifty miles of marshland, in which marshes there are the possibilities of half a dozen such affairs as that of Tinnenberg.

Russia has refused to allow her prison camps to be inspected by neutral diplomatic officers, as France, Great Britain, Germany and Austria have already permitted. She will permit food and clothing to be sent to the Russian military authorities, to be distributed by them to prisoners, but that is all. The State Department on November 19 made request to Russia to permit such visitation, but no reply has apparently been received.

Italy remains neutral for the time being; her ultimate intentions are doubtful. Rioting is reported to have taken place by anti-neutrals against the pacific party in the government. One thing concerning Italy appears to be certain, which is that she is about to possess herself of Albania. An expeditionary force of 20,000 men has been concentrated at Bari, an Italian port on the Adriatic, with the avowed intention of seizing Durazzo on the Albanian coast, and it is extremely probable that, once seized, it will be many a day before it will be given up. It will be remembered that some time ago Italy secured a foothold in Albania by the seizure of Avlona. It looks as though now she intends to complete her possession of the country, and very possibly there will be some bloodshed, though how much fighting Albania can do is very uncertain.

Speaking of Germany's resources in copper, the secretary of the German Iron Founders' Union made the statement at the annual meeting of that organization at Düsseldorf on February 1, "that as far as copper was concerned, by making use of all the bronze monuments and the copper cupolas of the churches and collecting all the copper we have used for other purposes in the last few years, Germany can hold out indefinitely. Besides, if necessary, we will seize everything made of copper in the conquered parts of Belgium and France."

London was alarmed during the week by reports of an intended Zeppelin raid. The raid did not, however, materialize.

The western battle line has been extremely devoid of incidents during the past week. The district between La Bassée and Ypres has been the only scene of sustained fighting. In this district the Germans have lost some ground to the English, but hardly enough to effect any serious change of positions. The losses on both sides have been greater than the possible advantage justified. The allied naval forces bombarded the German positions on the Belgian coast twice during the week, but here again the results are, as far as known, insignificant.

No serious attempt to break through by either side between the sea and Arras, until the spring, would seem almost dictated by the conditions of the country. The opening of the canals, which traverse the country here, by the Allies, and the consequent flooding of all low ground, practically the whole countryside, aided in stopping the German advance last autumn, but it has had the counter effect of making an allied advance now very difficult. To this artificial condition must be added natural winter conditions, and the cutting up of the roads by the continued movement of cavalry, artillery and transport wagons for five months. scribe the resultant mud as so deep and so soft as to make the movement of troops impossible.

There has been some fighting during the week near Soissons, farther to the east, which has centered in St. Paul, a suburb of that town, and has been indecisive. Near Rheims and to the north of Châlons there have been artillery duels of no particular violence, in which both sides claim the advantage. In the Argonne mining and counter-mining have gone on steadily, and every now and then one side or the other has blown up a trench of the enemy. There has been some slight loss of life, and a few prisoners have been made on both sides; on the whole, the advantages appear equal.

SAMUEL, VICTORIOUS LEADER

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR FEBRUARY 28.
I SAM. 7: 3-17

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By Rev. F. B. Meyer, D.D.

"Hitherto hath the Lord helped us," I Sam. 7: 12.

We may describe this sentence as the inscription on Samuel's stone of help. On Plymouth Hoe, which answers to Plymouth Rock, Drake played his famous game of bowls before embarking to meet the armada just sighted down the channel. On the monument, erected there to celebrate his victory, are these words: "He blew with his wind . . . they were scattered." That surely is a fitting motto for an Ebenezer stone. Nations and individuals must never forget that by the grace and help of God they are what they are; and all along the course of national and personal history, Ebenezer stones should be raised to tell what God hath wrought. "Not by an army . . . but by my Spirit, saith the Lord God of hosts." Hours of danger and anxiety should call us back to past deliverances. Let us recall our Ebenezer stones, when we need to be heartened to meet difficulty without, and the mutiny of a fearful heart within. Would God have done so much, and then leave us to fall into the power of our mighty foes? Has he delivered us in six troubles, and will he desert us in the seventh? Did he not calculate his resources before he espoused our case?

"Each sweet Ebenezer I have in review Confirms his good pleasure to help me quite through."

Enemies and Eben-ezers

By Amos R. Wells

SAMUEL was very wise, and he knew that the Israelites could never conquer the Philistines until they had conquered themselves; so he bade them put away their idols, and serve the Lord only. Every Christian needs to learn the little girl's sensible definition of repentance: "It is being sorry enough to quit." A man who had been robbed of a hundred dollars received this letter a long time afterward: "Dear Sir: Five years ago I robbed you of a hundred dollars. I am filled with remorse, and I send you a dollar and a half to ease my conscience." It was not such a farce that Samuel proposed, but a thorough-going reform.

Russell H. Conwell, when a boy, joined with other boys in dislodging a great boulder, which rolled down a hill through an orchard, doing immense damage. One boy told his father, and they were compelled to go to the orchard-owner and confess. Young Conwell was full of fear, but the old man put his hand on their shoulders, invited them in, gave them apples to eat, and sent them away relieved and happy. Samuel knew that God was like that farmer, ready and glad to forgive.

But forgiveness comes only to shamed and repentant hearts. "Prepare your hearts unto the Lord," was Samuel's wise advice. "Only melted gold is minted," writes F. B. Meyer; "only moistened clay is molded; only softened wax receives the die; only broken and contrite hearts can take and keep the impress of heaven." Many a man fails of the blessing of repentance because he makes a bargain of it, and not an abasement.

Why did the Israelites ask Samuel to pray for them in their dire emergency? And why did Samuel heed their request and not bid the people pray for themselves? In the first place, doubtless, the people did pray for themselves. Their very request that Samuel pray for them was in effect a prayer for themselves, and a humble one. And in the second place, we Protestants, in our just denial of the Roman Catholic system of proxy religion, are likely to lose the great value of genuine intercessory prayer. Paul prayed much for his converts, and often asked the churches to pray for him. Missionaries constantly beg our prayers. "Pray for me!" is usually the first word of a sinner turning to the light.

"Brother, if thou prayest for thyself alone," Augustine wrote to Ambrose, "one alone will pray for thee; but if thou prayest for all, all will pray for thee." The President of the United States may be addressed by any citizen, and if it is a proper petition, it will reach him and be heeded carefully; but a petition presented by a cabinet officer has especial force, because the President knows the petitioner has already put enough into his plea to win one strong mind. May we not believe that God, who gladly hears the sinner's prayer, listens with especial favor to such a prayer when it is forwarded by the prayer of a saint?

Prayer brings confidence. The Israelites were terribly afraid of the Philistines, but as Samuel prayed for them they ventured to pursue the foe. A Christian tells how he was faced with the necessity to do a certain thing which he dreaded and feared so horribly that the feeling threatened to ruin his efficiency. Therefore he prayed, not for success, nor to be freed from the necessity, but to be freed from the dread, and instead to find actual joy in the experience. The answer was such joy and peace as had seemed impossible, and a resulting power to do the work from which his whole being had shrunk before. Some such experience must have come to the Israelites as Samuel prayed for them.

That Eben-ezer stone, with its great meaning, "Hitherto hath the Lord helped us," has been set up in millions of lives since Samuel set it up between Mizpeh and Shen. Such a stone has been set up only a few score feet from my office, beside the Massachusetts State House. It is a beautiful column of granite, bearing on one side the inscription: "Americans, while from this eminence scenes of luxuriant fertility, of flourishing commerce, and the abodes of social happiness meet your view, forget not those who by their exertions have secured to you these blessings." It is a monument to the memory of the heroes of the Revolution.

Now all that has been done for us by the bravest and wisest men is insignificant compared with what God has done for us, since all their bravery and wisdom come from him, and were sustained by him. If we are grateful to men, how much more should we say "Thank you!" to God.

Samuel the Evangelist

By Arthur H. Howland

OUR last lesson told of the dreadful loss of the ark of the covenant and the departure of God's glory from Israel. The Philistines kept the ark for seven months, then sent it back. Evidently the sacred buildings at Shiloh had been destroyed; it is likely that the town itself was partially destroyed, for it never again seems to have any importance.

So the ark is placed in the home of Abinadab, where it remained many years. The "twenty years" referred to in the verse immediately preceding today's lesson cannot cover the whole time, for many more years intervened before King David sent to the house of Abinadab to bring the ark to Jerusalem (see II Sam. 6). The twenty years mark the time between the return of the ark by the Philistines and the beginning of Samuel's prophetic work.

The question very naturally arises: "Why was not Samuel doing the work of a prophet during these twenty years?" The right answer probably is that he was too young. Certain tasks of God can be wrought only by men into whose soul-fiber has gone the strength and experience and patience which only years can give. Moses, even at forty, sent into the wilderness for another forty years, to be made ready for God's use; Jesus, a carpenter for thirty years, making and repairing things for the use of men's bodies, before he began his work for their souls! Certain violin tones can be produced only upon old, old wood.

Wait! wait! wait! That is a hard lesson for the young. They cannot understand why God blocks their path and hems them in and refuses to let them dash forth in the ardor of their inexperience to set the world to rights. The most forceful and timely illustration of this ancient fact is the career of America's latest great apostle of evangelism, Billy Sunday. For the training of a prophet those years on the baseball diamond would seem to have been wasted. But they were not wasted. He was not only mastering the secrets of the American game, but he was mastering the secrets of America's life and America's thought and America's speech; and now, at fifty-two, he is shaking America's greatest cities for God.

Samuel may be called the first great evangelist. He was the first of the great prophets of Israel, and the work of the ancient prophet was very much the work of the modern evangelist. Dr. Elmslie thus describes the work of Samuel to which our lesson refers: "Everywhere Samuel, Nazirite and prophet, led a crusade against heathen worship, against sensual practices, against idolatry. Everywhere he fanned a great fire of absolute religious enthusiasm in the people. Inside the mass of apathetic, worldly-minded men he had established great and powerful classes of men devoted to religion, to patriotism, to God—the Nazarites and the schools of the prophets; men of ecstatic fervor, an inspired brotherhood."

Our lesson has at least two strikingly great phrases—one in the third verse, another in the twelfth. "And serve him only." Many people are willing to serve the Lord, but are not willing to serve him only. They are not willing to have their whole life fired with the flames of God's Spirit, all their thoughts and words and aims and acts inspired and controlled by his might and his love. It is not only a sad thing, but a perilous thing to let anything come between us and God, to let anything ever hinder God from carrying out his perfect will with us. When we do that we are serving something other than God.

The other passage is our Golden text: "Hitherto hath the Lord helped us." Surely he has; surely he will. He will help us today, tomorrow, all through this week, and the next, and the next, and through eternity. Never a burden too heavy; never a problem too hard; never a task too great. "As thy day, so shall thy strength be." "The Lord thy God is with thee, whithersoever thou goest." "I will not fail thee nor forsake thee."

MIZPEH! How many thousands of people, young and old, have worn "Mizpeh" pins without ever taking the time or pains to look up the meaning or find out where the word came from! Its original meaning is a "watch-tower" and was applied to at least seven locations in the Bible. The first one in Gen. 31: 49, where Jacob set up a pillar and urged his brethren to add stones until it became a heap. Laban called this heap Calced as a witness between him and Jacob, both fearing each other. Jacob named it "Mizpeh" and gave the name with the meaning "The Lord watch between me and thee when we are absent one from another."

The second and by far the most famous "Mizpeh" is that in connection with Samuel, the victorious leader of Israel, where he lived, where he built his house, where he judged Israel, where he gained a great victory against the Philistines, where he died and where most likely he was buried. In fact it is Samuel's monument that became the mountain itself, and is called "Neby Samwil" (Prophet Samuel!), and has been so known in all ages. It is the highest hill or peak in Central Palestine, and the highest mountain near Jerusalem. The Crusaders called it the "Mountain of Joy" because it was the first halting point that commanded a view of Jerusalem. It can be seen from every point of Central Palestine, while the views from its summit are the most extensive south of Mount Hermon.

When Shiloh fell into the hands of the Philistines, Israel's gathering place was "Mizpeh," and before Samuel's death it became the visible center of Israel's life. After his death it became a shrine and has remained so until this hour, revered alike by Jews, Christians and Moslems. At present it is a Moslem shrine of great sanctity. The summit of the hill is crowned by a finely built mosque from the minaret of which the visitor may get a magnificent view. The traditional tomb is reluctantly shown to Christians.

"Ebenezer." The stone of help was set up by Samuel to mark his victory. One of my earliest memories in southeast Pennsylvania, forty years ago, was looking into the window of a Methodist meeting house and hearing them sing "Here I'll raise my Ebenezer." Thus Mizpeh and Ebenezer link Samuel's day and life to our own three thousand years away.

Samuel was the first judge to found a "circuit court." He went from year to year in circuit to Bethel, Gilgal, Mizpeh and Ramah, where he dwelt. It was there he built an altar. Wise is the modern judge who in addition to his house and bench forgets not the altar and the church.

SUNDAY SCHOOL WORKERS' ROUND TABLE

Conducted by Frank L. Brown, Joint General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

WHAT lesson helps can you suggest for the teacher of a class of boys 16 years old?—Mrs. H. P. McC.

A. Tarbell's or Peloubet's Notes furnish splendid points and strong illustrations for this age. The Boys' Teacher (D. C. Cook Publishing Co., Elgin, Ill.), or the Teachers' Helps for the New International Senior Graded Lessons for 16-year-old classes will be found very helpful.

Q. We are starting a little Sunday school in a newly settled district here in Montana. I have been put in as superintendent. I have never held that important position before. I want the Sunday school to be run to the best advantage so that all will be helped and if possible led to Christ. Tell me just what to do.—Mrs. C. A.

A. Two or eight years ago I was in the same place of ignorance, but, like you, with a great desire to do my best and to win souls in the little school we had just started. Four thousand scholars have in those years been won to Christ through the efforts of the teachers and workers in that school. I bought two books, The Modern Sunday School, by Vincent, and The Model Superintendent, by Haven. They gave me some ideas to start with. If you get The Organized Sunday School, by Axtell, or The Sunday School Organized for Service, by Lawrence, or possibly The Superintendent and His Work, by the writer, you will get some suggestions which will start you. And God will use your best to his glory and the salvation of souls.

Q. A class of young ladies are about to organize their Sunday school class and are planning to raise the membership to 100. Could you give us any suggestions as to a name that would be suitable?—G. G.

A. The D. C. Cook Publishing Company, Elgin,

Ill., publishes a little booklet, 100 Organized Sunday School Classes and All About Them, in which they give suggestions as to organization of the class and a list of class names with suggested mottoes, colors and aims. They have pins also to fit the names. Among the names suggested by them for girls' classes are "I'll Try," "Grace and Grit," "Persistence," "Always True," "Royal Circle," "Builders," "Good Cheer," "Dayspring," "Sunbeam or Sunshine Circle," "Pleasant Words Circle," "Ruths and Lydias," "Good Will Circle," etc. From a list of names for organized girls' classes prepared by Miss Margaret Slattery, I would select "Whatsoever Class," motto, "Whatsoever he saith unto you, do it"; "Priscillas," motto, "Doing good"; "T. B. O. G. T.," "The Bearers of Good Tidings," motto, "Go and tell"; "Other Girls," motto, the poem "Others"; "P. & W.," motto, "Persevere and win"; "Friendship Club," motto, "Would you have a friend? You must be one"; "Y. C. D. O. U.," "You can depend on us"; "The Hill Climbers," motto, "Difficulties show what men are"; "W. W. C.," "Worth While Class," motto, "Choose the things worth while"; "S. O. T. K.," "Servants of the King," motto, "I serve."

Q. Have you anything along the line of plays or entertainments for a Sunday school class of girls from 14 to 18? I don't know where to find anything suitable for a Sunday school social.—Mrs. W. J. G.

A. Write the Missionary Education Movement, 156 Fifth Avenue, New York, for samples of their missionary plays which will combine social life with instruction. Get Reisner's Social Plans for Young People, or Five Hundred Ways to Help Your Church, by Theresa H. Wolcott.

"HIS LOVED AND HIS OWN"

AMIDST all the talk of war and of business depression and of the so-called failure of the church at home and abroad, it is wonderfully refreshing to realize that there still can be found Christian institutions running full time and keeping true to their aim. It is a satisfaction to have a part in things that accomplish something. Usually things that are worth while do keep going whatever the circumstances around them. It is not often, if it is ever, that we find our God drawing back from an enterprise into which he has called any centrated on these little lives. We have constantly tried to hold up before our readers the vision of this small army of recruits being so splendidly trained for Christian service. We feel that these children, so many of them saved from cruel and unnameable fates, so many of them saved from untimely death, have been brought within your care for a divine purpose. We know they are human. ("Human"? you would never doubt it if you once saw their happy, thoughtful, earnest faces.) We do not expect them all to be fiery prophets in the land; some may even of us who are trying to do his will on earth. And we rejoice in the steadfast Christian work that is being done among the orphans of China.

Some readers may have made such a colossal error as to suppose that all the orphans of China are being looked after by Christian men and women. We do not know how many orphans there are in that great land, but certainly 1,005 constitute a very small proportion. And yet somehow that number has been selected by Providence for the especial attention of Christian Herald hearts. And Christian Herald readers certainly can feel that their generous gifts to this work have been most beneficially expended.

So far as reports show, all the orphans being cared for through the Christian Herald are making progress in their different orphanage homes. There have been changes, of course, and removals by death and in other ways, but the total number has been kept intact. Some of these boys and girls have "graduated" into the busy scenes of life, equipped to look after themselves, mentally, morally and physically. They have been trained to be bread-winners, and in almost all cases soul-winners as well; at least their feet have been set in the pathway of righteousness and they have in many cases expressed their intention to do all in their power to lead their fellow countrymen into a knowledge of Christ.

And still the good work goes bravely on in the orphanage homes. Kindergarten training for the little ones, school studies, weaving, dress-making, farming, tailoring, carpentering, rug-making, and many other useful things occupy the hours. The love and interest of many earnest-minded Christian missionaries are condisappoint us wholly. But we are sure the money which has been expended in this way has, every dollar of it, been blessed of God.

We are now approaching the time when the regular quarterly remittance must be met, and we would remind all our friends of this work, especially those who have accepted the responsibility of patrons for individual children. The yearly cost for one child is twenty dollars, and that covers complete care and all the child's needs. Several hundred of the children have been "given" by name to friends who have contributed twenty dollars yearly for their support. We would like to extend this list considerably. Yet the bulk of the work has been maintained by smaller contributions, and gifts of any amount are welcome. We know that America is being sorely taxed by the many calls for help that come from all sides this dreadful year. But your resources and your bounty are not by any means exhausted, so long as you have a coin to give in a good cause and the impulse to give it. But for the Chinese orphans do not give as little as you can, but as much.

The children, as you know, are distributed with many other such in a number of orphanages in different provinces, and the missionaries in charge have always been wonderfully encouraged in their general work by the regularity of receipts for the Christian Herald children. This note of encouragement should not grow faint at this time of all others, when the income of workers throughout the mission fields is being more or less interrupted. Please let us hear from you all promptly and generously.

Address, the Chinese Orphan Fund, the Christian Herald, Bible House, New York.

LIFE'S NEED TODAY

HAVE you a kindly word of cheer?
Oh give it, friend, today;
I need it while I'm toiling here,
To light the lonely way.
'Tis while life's burdens sorely press,
And grief weighs down my heart,
I need, amid its strain and stress,
The strength you may impart.

It will not matter, by and by,
When life's long march is past;
Its weariness forgot, I lie
In peaceful rest at last.
The flowers that on my breast you lay,

Beside me kneeling low,
And all the kind words then you say—
I shall not care or know.

I shall not need the comfort then
That now would mean so much—
I shall have found, beyond life's pain,
Through death's dear healing touch,
The full sweet life that knows no care,
The joys I longed for so—
O friend, if you've a word of cheer,
Give while its need I know!

me and I love her very much, and she is willing to pay anybody who will help her get me back to where I live and where my dog friends are.

Mrs. M. R. BABCOCK, 235 Central Street, Springfield, Mass.

$25 Reward!

BOW WOW, please, I'm David. I'm named David because he was a shepherd king, in the Bible, and I'm a shepherd dog. I am a Scotch collie and a beauty—so everybody says, though I don't know what that means either. I have a lovely fur coat, all brown and white which never comes off except when they cut it off in hot weather, and a white fur collar around my neck. I am not lost, because I know where I am; but, like the little girl in the story, "I don't know where nobody is and nobody don't know where I am," and I can't send a letter to tell my people. My mistress, Mrs. M. R. Babcock, lives at 235 Central Street, Springfield, Mass., and August 24 she paid about $7 to a man named American Express Company to take me to Enfield, Nova Scotia, and he says he can't tell where I am. I heard this by dog wireless. He says I gnawed through my box, but I didn't. I wish anybody who sees me will write a letter to my mistress and tell her how to find me, because she loves me and I love her very much, and she is willing to pay anybody who will help her get me back to where I live and where my dog friends are.

THE PRAYER LEAGUE

MRS. A. T. writes acknowledging answer to prayer for a brother who was insane. He has recovered and returned from the asylum. Mrs. C. W. B. writes: "A few weeks ago I asked prayer for a daughter who had been in the state hospital for nearly five years. The request has been granted in measure. She has so far recovered as to come home. Pray for her complete recovery." A Missouri judge writes: "I wrote in the early spring to ask that prayer be made for an absent son. I know God heard and answered prayer, as my son returned home in the early summer and has been a great comfort to me and my family." Mrs. M. M. W. writes, acknowledging answer to prayers for her son, who has apparently lost the appetite for strong drink.

A beautiful letter, written by a lady, comes from a town in British Columbia. "I just want to say that a small prayer was answered recently for me, the first real prayer I had uttered from my heart for eight years. I need not tell you of all the misery I have suffered and how through this misery I lost God out of my life and heart. I am here a nervous wreck, full of bitterness against every one and everything. For three days I had hardly anything to eat; all seemed black, and the evil was doing his best to tell me to end it all, saying that then I should have peace. I went for my mail; there was nothing. Coming down the steps of the post office I felt so sad, so weak, I just cried out from my poor, breaking heart: 'O God, send me a friend. Don't let me drift and break down again.' I went a little way down the street and met a man at whose house I had called that morning for work, and he told me to go to his office. He gave me two dollars and told me to get some food. Then he sent kind, gentle words to see me, who brought me clothes and food and cheered me up wonderfully. My first prayer for years had been answered, quickly, lovingly and thoroughly. Never again will I doubt God's love. I am God's child once more. If my letter could only reach some poor lonely soul that is going through a bad time as I did, let it tell him not to doubt about a God. There is a God, a loving God. He will help them if they ask him as I did outside that post office when my heart was breaking. His beautiful messengers were around me that day, guiding my tired-out feet to the right spot for food and love."

Acknowledgments of answers to prayer have also been received from: Mrs. C. H. T.; F. O. B., Orange, Mass.; Mrs. W. H. C., Philadelphia, Pa.; Mrs. A. M., Petersburg, Va.; E. A., Livonia, N. Y.; H. R., Minong, Wis.; B. M., East Lynn, Ill. (for renewed health of body and soul); Mrs. C. J. B., Mont Verde, Fla.; N. A telegram has come from Mrs. A. L., saying: "Request prayer that a little boy who seems dying may live to see God." A pleading letter comes from Mrs. C. L. G., asking prayers for spiritual peace and for guidance in teaching her children. Another letter asks anxiously for prayer that a home trouble, which threatens to disrupt the household, may be removed. A somewhat similar letter comes from a father who feels that other members of his household are treating him unjustly. A minister writes, asking prayer for relief from a heavy burden.

Prayers are asked for revivals at: Greely Center, Iowa; Colville, Wash.; Freeman, S. D.; Marble Hill, Mo.; Auburn Four Corners, Pa.; Norwich, Ont.; Sedalia, Tenn. (that community and churches may be led by the Spirit and the Word); Bluffton, S. C.; Sharp Corners, Ont.; Princeton, N. J.; Boomville, N. Y.; Hartford, N. Y.; Penryn, Pa. (for conversion of the unsaved in the community and growth and success of the church). Special blessing is asked for revival meetings being held or about to be held at: Bellefonte, Ark.; Creighton, Neb.; Athol, Ind.; Mannsfield, Pa. For blessings upon church at Meadow Grove, Neb.; Lanark, Ill.; Malone, N. Y. Prayers are asked for the establishment of a Presbyterian church in a needy community. Special prayers are asked for the revival and upbuilding of a church at Jamesport, Mo. F. W. M. asks prayers for guidance in endeavors to open a Gospel mission; Mrs. E. S. D., that the members of her Sunday school class be converted; E. F. G., for the overthrow of vice throughout North America; N. B. S., for the success of movement to get Bibles in their own language for the soldiers in Europe.

A Texas Mother and Mrs. M. D. B. ask prayer that the minds of their sons may be restored; Mrs. E. H., her husband's; M. L. C., his wife's; two sisters ask prayer that a brother's and a sister's mind may be restored. Fourteen other friends ask prayer for mental restoration or strengthening for themselves or friends.

Seventeen friends ask prayer for restoration or strengthening of sight for themselves or others.

Forty-three friends ask prayer for a deeper work of grace, assurance of sins forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing.

Prayer is asked that twenty persons be saved from the liquor habit.

Mrs. N. M. D. asks prayer that four friends may be cured of the drug habit; Miss A. D., a nephew; M. S. R., a friend; T. J. H., self.

Thirty-nine parents ask prayer for the conversion of sons, including one mother that five sons may be saved.

Seventeen wives ask prayer for the conversion of their husbands.

Fifty-two friends ask prayer for the conversion of other relatives and friends.

Seventeen readers ask prayer for special spiritual blessing for relatives or friends.

Two husbands ask prayer for the healing of their wives; five wives for the healing of their husbands; fourteen parents for the healing of their daughters; eight mothers and fathers for the healing of sons, including one for healing of son's defective speech; seven sons and daughters ask prayer that their mothers may be restored to health, including one that mother may regain the power of speech, and another that mother may be restored to perfect health and be able to sleep; one friend asks prayer for the healing of her father; three for the healing of brothers; ten for the healing of sisters; forty-nine for healing for themselves, including one that she may regain the use of limbs; nineteen for healing of other friends and relatives, including two that pastors may be restored to health and strength.

Sixteen friends ask prayer for healing of hearing for themselves or other friends.

Forty-one friends ask prayer for help or guidance in financial affairs.

Fifty-nine friends ask prayer for the granting of varied desires and needs, including one that two little orphan children may find a permanent home together; another that a heart-broken girl may be restored to her loved home this spring; another that brother may return home and mother be comforted; and another requests prayer for news of an absent brother and for his safe return to his family soon.

The Country
Gentleman

They came from every state in the Union—not a state missing—in response to one single article in THE COUNTRY GENTLEMAN.

Within a month nearly 10,000 of our readers wrote the Department of Agriculture at Washington, asking for the bulletin referred to in our article.

The official in charge of this governmental department says: "What the people want nowadays, especially those who read the agricultural journals, are facts told in the least possible space. I thought you would be interested in this one illustration of how your feature articles are received by the public. Every state in the Union has been heard from."

Ten thousand letters in one month about one article gives some idea of the value of a wide-awake farm weekly to wide-awake farm people.

You need this up-to-date fact paper in your farm business!

Incidentally—Is there any farm problem that is bothering you? THE COUNTRY GENTLEMAN will solve it.

Any problem about management, crops, feeding, markets, orchards, chickens—any farm question at all—will be answered for any reader of THE COUNTRY GENTLEMAN personally and promptly by mail. We have more than 100 experts to perform this service for you absolutely without charge.

Ordinarily THE COUNTRY GENTLEMAN sells for five cents the copy or $1.50 the year. But—

To put this big national farm weekly at once into half a million farm homes, the next 13 issues of THE COUNTRY GENTLEMAN will be mailed to your address for 25 cents—less than two cents a copy!

The Chinese Woolflower

The three most popular garden flowers the world over were all named and introduced in the past 20 years (the Golden Glow, Hybrid Cosmos and Gladiolus Chidli America) a record without a parallel. This year we add to the trio another lovely, equally unique, equally valuable and of surpassing brilliancy. It will find its way over the world as quickly as the others did and take its place everywhere as the foremost garden annual.

The Chinese Woolflower is a Celosia of new form and easy growth, two feet high with a score of branches each crowned with a great crimson ball of woolly substance which holds its color and beauty all through the season making it the most interesting, novel and showy of all garden or pot annuals.

Price 20 cts. per pkt. 40 to 50 seeds, 2 pkts. for 50 cts., together with New BLUE PETUNIA and GIANT SUMMER COSMOS free for trial and Catalog.

Our Big Catalogue of Flower and Veg. Seeds, Bulbs, Plants and rare new Fruits free to all who apply. We are the largest growers in the world of Gladiolus, Cannas, Dahlias, Lilies, Iris, etc., and our stocks are best and cheapest.

SNOW AND SNOWBALLS

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

"SHE'S like a snowball," said Eleanor, vindictively; "she's just like a snowball."

"A snowball?" I questioned vaguely. My mind swept to the girl in question—to her dark slenderness, her soft pink cheeks, her sarcastic tongue. "Why a snowball?" I wondered.

Eleanor turned toward me in the dim light and fixed her large eyes mournfully on my face.

"Didn't you ever," she asked, "make a snowball and roll it along the ground?"

I turned to the window and looked out across the drift-filled winter landscape. In imagination, I saw a small, pigtailed little girl with a red Tam o' Shanter pulled over her ears, and red mittens on her fingers, and shiny boyish rubber boots to her knees, who pushed through waist-deep snowbanks. I could see her hands patting a fat snow man into shape, giving him eyes and nose and mouth made of coal. I could see her chubby form stumble and almost fall as she pushed along a huge snowball for his body, a smaller one for his head.

"Oh, yes!" I answered, wistfully, perhaps, "I have rolled snowballs along the ground."

"Then"—Eleanor's voice quickened with interest—"then you will understand just what I mean. You start out with a small handful of snow and push it through the drifts. And as it rolls along it gathers snow, until it has become huge—as big as you are, maybe. And finally, when it is all finished and you look back over your shoulder, you see that it has gathered up all the snow and that there is a brown, sorry-looking path of dirt left!" She paused triumphantly.

"Yes—but—" I hesitated; "yes—I understand—but—"

Eleanor gave a sound half-way between a superior little laugh and a superior little snort.

"You don't understand at all," she told me. "You don't understand at all! You can't imagine why I think that she is like a snowball."

"To be truthful," I admitted ruefully, "I don't!"

Eleanor chuckled.

"Have you ever been in the room with her—at a party?" she asked. "Have you ever seen a company of glowing, interested people—and then noticed the change when she appeared? Why, my dear, she immediately dominates the conversation, and begins saying disagreeable things—bits of scandal, maybe, or hard knocks about your friends. Before you know it there is an argument—nine or ten arguments—going on, and her conversation and her scandals and her knocks keep growing bigger and bigger, like the snowball does. And then finally, when she does leave, the group of people who were sparkling and crisp and happy looking, like a snowfield in the sun, are brown and sullen and discouraged, like the track that a snowball leaves behind it!"

There are many snowball people in the world—too many of them by far.

People who drain the color and sparkle out of life and leave a dark path, stretching out to mark the road they have traveled. They are the ones who scatter distrust and hate and envy just as surely as a certain type of mosquito brings malaria and yellow fever germs—just as unhappily as the tiny leaf of poison ivy brings discomfort with its touch.

Did you ever stand by a city window with your nose pressed, button-like, against the glass, and watch the flurry of a good old-fashioned snowstorm? Did you ever notice how it slips down softly over jagged sidewalks, and dull roofs, and grimy lamp posts, like a soft mantle of velvet or swansdown (the kind that they put around the edge of tiny baby hoods)? And, standing there, what impressed you most of all?

When I stand in a city window and gaze out into a snowstorm, it isn't the coldness or the dampness that I notice, it isn't the persistency or the relentlessness of it. I doubt if that impresses anyone who is warm and cosy inside of some house. What impresses me more than I could possibly express to you is the unutterable softness of it—the kindness of it, as it drapes its beautiful garment over rough outlines and softens unpleasant surfaces.

There is another type of girl who is like the snowstorm—a girl that I glory in calling the snow-girl—who stands in marked contrast to the snowball girl. She is the girl who, on entering a room, puts folk at their ease by some charming little story, and softens the clash of "knocking" that often rises out of nowhere. She is the girl who drapes a garment of charitable thought over the rough outlines in other people's characters, and softens the unpleasant surfaces that mar the beauty of their lives.

The snowball habit is an easy one to get into—a dreadfully easy habit—but oh! friends of mine, it's a hard habit to break. It is a very easy thing to pick flaws in other folk, to criticize unprotesting people. It is not hard to believe the worst instead of the best. In fact, it is temptingly simple—enticingly fascinating. There is just one real cure that I know of for the habit. Take yourself, turn yourself around rigidly before some unflattering mental mirror and try to look into your own eyes in the unprejudiced way that a stranger would look. Take your smallest fault and hold it under a powerful microscope as you would a bug. Perhaps you will be quite a little surprised to realize how large it can look. Take the little harmless bit of a joke that seemed so clever yesterday, and wonder what you would say if someone else—some one you didn't like—had done it! Perhaps that may help to cure you.

Oh, girls, a snowball is after all a hard, cold and, when you consider it, a perfectly useless thing. But a snowstorm—when you view it from the warmth and happiness of your home—is pure, beautiful and soul-satisfying. Which of the two would you care to resemble?

WHAT MAKES THE DIFFERENCE?

Did you ever stop to think how a few flowers can change the whole appearance of a place? On an uptown city street is a row of houses, for all the world like dozens of other rows of "brownstone fronts" on dozens of other crowded streets; somewhere near the middle of it is a certain house where on the window sills, all the way from the basement up to the top story, are boxes filled with cheerful evergreens.

They won't be there long now, for just about the time one begins to have misgivings about a new spring bonnet those boxes are always freshly filled with bright geraniums. Then, when April comes and makes us long for the country, the housewife does her family and the weary public a good turn by making her windows gay with tulips and jonquils—and a month later follow the many-colored pansies.

And—this is the point of this true story—I don't believe that any one ever thinks of that house as "one of a row." It is the house; the row ends on one side of it and begins again on the other. Did you ever stop to think how a few flowers can change the whole value of a place?

Woman

Makes Money in California

Mrs. E. V. Coleman farms seventy-five acres near Riverbank, in Stanislaus County, San Joaquin Valley, California, and makes good money. Sixty acres lie along the Stanislaus River, and the remainder upland. She has thirty-five acres of peaches, eight of apricots, two of prunes, of almonds, five of olives. The remainder is alfalfa. She grew 405 tons of peaches this season, selling 350 tons fresh, and drying fifteen tons. She also dried eight tons of prunes. The other orchard trees did equally well. During the season forty men and women were employed in the cutting house, and thirty-five on the ranch. The Fresno Republican says of this ranch:

"Nothing is allowed to go to waste. The apricots are marketed at an average of $20 per ton. Peaches are $5 per ton to orchardists, and all not so disposed of are used for cooking purposes. The almond hulls, with a little, are fed to the cows. The hulls bring $1.00 per ton. The nonpareil almond, this season, is extremely large and an exhibition from these trees will be shown at the 1915 fair. The olives are estimated at $1,000 per acre this year, not including apples and cherries, a few other fruits grown in smaller quantities, and above all expenses. A few cows, chickens, pigs, rabbits are kept on the ranch at a small cost."

What other farmers there are doing in our "San Joaquin Valley" folders, which we would like to send you free. Will you write to-day?

KNOW NOW

And Will Never Forget the Experience.

The coffee drinker who has suffered and then been completely relieved by changing from coffee to Postum knows something valuable. There's no doubt about it.

I learned the truth about coffee in a peculiar way," says a California woman. "My husband, who has, for years, been of a bilious temperament, decided to leave off coffee and give Postum a trial, and as I did not want the trouble of making two beverages for meals I concluded to try Postum too. The results have been that when my husband has been greatly benefited, I have myself received even greater benefit.

"When I began to drink Postum I was thin in flesh and very nervous. Now I actually weigh 16 pounds more than I did at that time and I am stronger physically and in my nerves, while husband has freed from all his ills.

"We have learned our little lesson about coffee and we know something about Postum, too, for we have used Postum now steadily for the last three years and we shall continue to do so.

"We have no more use for coffee—the old drink. We prefer Postum and eat."

Given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Well-Being" in pkgs.

Postum comes in two forms:

Regular Postum—must be well boiled. Send 25c packages.

Instant Postum—is a soluble powder. A teaspoonful dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. Send 50c tins.

The cost per cup of both kinds is about the same.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETINGS

Winsome to Win Some

Epworth League Topic for February 28. Ps. 126; Acts 2: 46, 47

THIS topic is far more than a clever play upon words. The way to win some is to be winsome. Sour religion is dreadful. People will follow happiness, and when they see happiness in you they will want to know where you found it. "Then was our mouth filled with laughter, and our tongue with singing." And then said they among the heathen, "The Lord hath done great for them." When the early Christians were "praising God and having favor with all the people," "the Lord added daily to the church such as should be saved."

Does Jesus bless you so that you are really happy, really kind, really patient, really strong and brave and good? Again and again God's salvation is compared in the Bible to things that are delicious and beautiful—water for the thirsty, bread to the hungry, fruit and honey, dew and rain, mountains, music, love, laughter. Let God make your life beautiful. Pray with the psalmist. "Let the beauty of the Lord our God be upon us." Then others will be drawn to seek the beauty and joy you have found, and seeking these things will find your Christ.

What Will Improve Our Prayer Meetings?

Christian Endeavor Topic for February 28. 1 Cor. 14: 1-12, 26. (Led by the prayer meeting committee)

A DISCUSSION of this topic will be found in the Christian Herald of January 27 in the notes on the B. Y. P. U.

Social Gains in Heathen Lands

B. Y. P. U. Topic for February 28. Rom. 1: 16-23. (Conquest meeting)

SUGGESTIVE material for a discussion of this subject will be found in the Christian Herald of February 3 in notes on the Epworth League topic: "The Challenge of the Changing East."

World to Meet in America

pilgrimage is, on the face of it, the most serious setback the exposition must face.

Oddly enough, the management refuses to be dismayed by the situation. If the war is preventing Europe from coming to America, it is also preventing America from making its annual excursion abroad, the management argues; and consequently the whole United States will just naturally wend its way to the Pacific Coast. Which doesn't seem an unreasonable view of the matter: a view that holds good also in the case of South America. South American countries have almost gotten in each other's way in order to make the best showing at the exposition at San Francisco, and it is a natural supposition that they will be equally eager to see their exhibits in place.

All this is going to bring North and South America in very much closer touch than ever before. These progressive countries to the south—and they are far more progressive than the majority of us know—are going to link arms with us of self-satisfied America, gently direct our steps before their glass cases, and with a courtly wave of their hands indicate a few objects that will make us open our eyes. It is going to be good for us. It is going to reduce our pride a little and increase our respect for other people. It is going to awaken our interest in Central and South America, and stimulate our friendship for those countries and stimulate our trade with them.

Perhaps exactly the same effect is going to be produced in turn upon Brazil, Argentina and Chile and the rest of those great countries. That will be a good thing for them. It is high time they knew us better and gained clearer understanding of our resources. For there is no mistaking the fact that the war in Europe and the Panama Canal tend to bring about tremendously increased interrelations between the two American continents. If the Pan-American Exposition resolves into a Pan-American Exposition, it may achieve a greater success than the most optimistic had hoped for along the lines laid down.

Beech-Nut Tomato Catsup

THE good housekeeper, making catsup for her family, would make it the Beech-Nut way. For the Beech-Nut way is just the same care and delicacy of treatment that you use in your own cooking.

She would no more re-cook her materials than we do, knowing that to re-cook a tomato is to lose its fresh, delicate flavor.

She would take the same care as we do to have her tomatoes from nearby farms—not shipped long distances. She would make and bottle her Catsup fresh and hot—sterilize and seal immediately.

And she would get the same fine flavor in her Catsup as we do in Beech-Nut.

Get a bottle of Beech-Nut Tomato Catsup from your grocer, and see if we are not right.

Anyhow, she didn't to me, the two or three times I saw her."

There was a short silence; then, a little slowly, young Pendleton said:

"I think that was one of the things that was worrying me. That game has been so much to so many people. It has meant so much everywhere, all through the town! I couldn't bear to think of her giving it up and not playing it. At the same time I couldn't fancy a grown-up Pollyanna perpetually admonishing people to be glad for something. Someway, I—well, as I said, I—I just didn't want Pollyanna to grow up, anyhow."

"Well, I wouldn't worry," shrugged the elder man, with a peculiar smile. "Always, with Pollyanna, you know, it was the 'clearing-up shower,' both literally and figuratively; and I think you'll find she lives up to the same principle now—though perhaps not quite in the same way. Poor child, I fear she'll need some kind of game to make existence endurable, for a while, at least."

"Do you mean because Mrs. Chilton has lost her money? Are they so very poor, then?"

"I suspect they are. In fact, they are in rather bad shape, so far as money matters go, as I happen to know. Mrs. Chilton's own fortune has shrunk unbelievably, and poor Tom's estate is very small, and hopelessly full of bad debts—professional services never paid for, and that never will be paid for. Tom could never say no when his help was needed, and all the dead-beats in town knew it and imposed on him accordingly. Expenses have been heavy with him lately. Besides, he expected great things when he should have completed his special work in Germany. Naturally he supposed his wife and Pollyanna were more than amply provided for through the Harrington estate; so he had no worry in that direction."

"Hm-m; I see, I see. Too bad, too bad."

"But that isn't all. It was about two months after Tom's death that I saw Mrs. Chilton and Pollyanna in Rome, and Mrs. Chilton was in a terrible state. In addition to her sorrow, she had just begun to get an inkling of the trouble with her finances, and she was nearly frantic. She refused to come home. She declared she never wanted to see Beldingsville, or anybody in it, again. You see, she has always been a particularly proud woman, and it was all affecting her in a rather curious way. Pollyanna said that her aunt seemed possessed with the idea that Beldingsville had not approved of her marrying Dr. Chilton in the first place, at her age; and now that he was dead, she felt they were utterly out of sympathy in any grief that she might show. She resented keenly, too, the fact that they must now know that she was poor as well as widowed. In short, she had worked herself into an utterly morbid, wretched state, as unreasonable as it was terrible. Poor little Pollyanna! It was a marvel to me how she stood it. If Mrs. Chilton continues to keep it up, that child will be a wreck. That's why I said Pollyanna would need some kind of a game if anybody ever did."

"The pity of it!—to think of that happening to Pollyanna!" exclaimed the young man in a voice that was not quite steady.

"Yes; and you can see all is not right by the way they are coming today—so quietly, with not a word to anybody. That was Polly Chilton's doing, I'll warrant. She didn't want to be met by anybody. I understand she wrote to no one but her Old Tom's wife, Mrs. Durgin, who had the keys."

"Yes, so Nancy told me—good old soul! She'd got the whole house open, and had contrived somehow to make it look as if it wasn't a tomb of dead hopes and lost pleasures. Of course the grounds looked fairly well, for Old Tom has kept them up, after a fashion. But it made my heart ache—the whole thing."

"Are you going to the station?"

"I am."

How would you like to travel 108 miles by sleigh in zero weather?

That's what President Terry of the Hartford Fire Insurance Company did after the great New York fire of December 16, 1835, in order to make immediate payment of the Hartford's losses. Thus eighty years ago did the Hartford demonstrate its high regard for its obligations.

In the same staunch spirit the Hartford promptly paid out $1,900,000 after the Chicago fire, and $10,000,000 after the San Francisco disaster. Through all the 104 years of its history the Hartford has met every honest obligation cheerfully and on the dot of time. Do you wonder that its policy holders are satisfied?

The Hartford agent in your town will tell you more about Hartford protection. If you wish, we will ask him to call.

ECONOMY in the use of BUTTER

By using the following recipe one pound of Butter will double its weight and cut your butter bill almost one-half:

BUTTER MIXTURE

1 lb. good butter 1 heaping teaspoonful Knox Gelatine
2 pint bottles milk 2 teaspoonfuls salt

Take the top cream of two pint bottles of milk and add enough of the milk to make one pint.

Soak the gelatine in two tablespoonfuls of the milk 10 minutes; place dish over hot water until gelatine is thoroughly dissolved. Cut the butter in small pieces and place same in a dish over hot water until the butter begins to soften; then gradually whip the milk and cream and dissolved gelatine into the butter with a Dover egg beater. After the milk is thoroughly beaten into the butter add the salt to taste.

If the milk forms keep on beating until all is mixed in. Place on ice or in a cool place until hard. If a yellow color is desired, use butter coloring.

NOTE. This mixture is intended for immediate use, and will do the work of two pounds of ordinary butter for table use and for baking cakes, muffins, etc.

KNOX SPARKLING GELATINE is also used to make Desserts, Jellies, Puddings, Ice Creams, Sherbets, Candies, etc.

Let us send you our recipe book. It is FREE for your grocer's name.

Pint sample (enough to make two lots of the Butter Mixture) will be sent for 2c stamp.

How to Have Health and Long Life

THAT TIRED, LAUGUID FEELING you frequently have is nature's message to you that you are eating wrong foods or possibly the right foods in wrong combinations and under conditions that make it impossible for you to assimilate their health-giving elements and eliminate all waste products.

The Secret of Health is pure blood; pure blood is made from right food, air and water, taken in right proportions and at the right time. When you know the right thing to do you can prevent sickness and cure yourself of most of the ills of body and mind. You can be well all the time.

If you are to keep well and live long you must possess the knowledge of how to keep the blood pure. The International Health League is distributing a series of lectures and personal letters on Health education which tells you how to bring about this highly important condition. To introduce this interesting and instructive series of lectures a preliminary lecture (price $1.00) called "The 4 Keys to Good Health" will be mailed to readers of the Christian Herald for only 10 cents.

Dr. Keefer, who is the author of this series of lectures, is the President of the League, and has been a practicing physician in New York State for more than 30 years. The League has no Drugs, Appliances, Foods, or Foods for sale.

Hupmobile
Car of the American Family

We believe the Hupmobile to be the best car of its class in the world

But what does the public believe?

What "they say" is the foundation of reputation; what "they say" makes or breaks men, businesses and motor cars. "They" are the people who buy over 500,000 automobiles a year. "They" know automobiles. For "they" use them. And "they say" the Hupmobile is the best car of its class in the world. "They" have made the Hup the fastest selling car on the market at $1200. Hupmobile hasn't won this position by chance or good luck. Put on merit.

Because the Hupmobile is distinctive and distinguished in appearance. It has REAL good looks.

Because it has a motor that is powerful, economical, sweet running, true as steel in all kinds of service all the time.

Because the Hup is a big, luxurious, comfortable car—a full $1200 worth of satisfaction for the whole family.

Because it is sturdy, free from constant repairs. Hups are more economical than most cars because they "stand up" for season after season.

Because at $1200 the Hup gives you every automobile refinement—electric starter and lights; over-size tires with non-skids on rear wheels; one-man top; quick acting storm curtains; spiral bevel driving gears (found on no other car under $2000); de-mountable rims—in a word, all the latest and best features.

Because—and this is the biggest reason of all—the 1915 Hupmobile is the greatest and best of all Hups; the biggest value ever built by a Company which has the name of having always built the best cars at the price. Make the test for yourself and see what "they" think of the Hupmobile. Ask any Hup owner—or ANY automobile owner—any garage man. Learn their opinion of the Hupmobile.

Then see the cars themselves. Put them to the merit test. We are willing to abide by your decision.

Questions and Answers

A Reader. About a year ago I became deeply convinced of sin. I was already a church member and perhaps a believer, but I did not have the evidence, nor had I lived a consistent life. After a long, hard struggle I surrendered, and God blessed me. He shed abroad his love in my heart, and I could say "My Saviour" and "My Father." But now a dissatisfaction has sprung up in my heart. I feel that something is lacking. Why is it that God keeps me in almost everything and not in all? What is meant by abiding in Christ? What is the "second blessing"?

Your experience is by no means uncommon. Many persons who have long been identified with the church come to feel the need of a definite experience which shall make them conscious of loving God and really desirous to please him. The experience of peace found by such a seeker is the same as that which comes to any unconverted person who has never made any profession of religion. But the second part of your problem is still more a matter of common experience. When one has been soundly converted such feelings of dissatisfaction as you mention are almost sure to follow the first weeks or months of peace. They point the way to a still higher and better experience to which the Holy Spirit would lead us. It is not necessary to bother with explanations and definitions about this "second blessing." The Bible and Christian experience unite in summoning all converts to this "higher ground," into this inner circle. God certainly can keep you "in all things" as well as in some. You must trust him for cleansing and keeping and energizing power, as well as for pardoning and regenerating power. Study carefully such passages as Ezek. 36: 25-27; II Cor. 7: 1; Gal. 3: 14-21; Col. 3: 1; I Thess. 5: 23; Heb. 4: 9-11; Heb. 10: 1-23; Heb. 13: 20. Appropriating these and God's other "rich promises" to your own soul's needs, go forward vigorously in helping and serving others, and you will find the Christian life an ever-deepening satisfaction and delight.

the whole assembled body of the brethren about 120 (Acts 1: 15). He has been variously discussed by Christian writers, and some have that "Paul was the divine appointment" is said to have preached the Ethiopia and to have at last suffered martyrdom.

N. S., DeKalb, N. Y. 1. Thomas Jesus in the remark: "Let us also may die with him." (John 11: 16.) Jews had sought to kill Jesus. (See John 8: 31; Luke 9: 22. 2. The fact that set his face toward Jerusalem (Luke 19: 41) the Samaritans to reject him as Messiah because they had been taught that he would come to Mount Gerizim. (Com. 4: 20, 21.) The Samaritans still consider Gerizim the most sacred place in the world. 3. The waters of the Sea of Galilee not salt. It is fed by the river Jordan fresh from the mountain streams. The Jordan also takes the waters away. They flow ultimately into the sea which is salt because it has no outlet.

J. B. M., Richfield Springs, N. Y. I read the account in Luke 22: 54-61, and get the setting of the group to which Peter's triple denial of the Master. He was the serving-men in the hall or courtyard of the palace. They could look up to the windows. It was cold outside and the warming themselves by the fire. I sketch the picture for us in his book the Messiah: "As Peter walked down toward the outer court, first one maid then, as he returned, he encountered the door porter; then, in the inner court, he mingled again with the crowd around the fire; first one man and about him turned upon him charging being a disciple and accomplice of Jesus together he gave the same denial—an oath [see Matt. 26: 72]. The words had scarcely died out when, shrill, the cock-crowing was heard." no indication anywhere in the Gospel that the cock was in the palace of the high priest. That building, according to well-informed writers, stood on a hill only a short distance from the city wall. The crowing could easily have been heard by those in the court. Even today in the courtyard of the high priest's residence the cock-crowing is a common signal of the approach.

Miscellaneous

E. S. D., Deforest, Wis. It is not enough to do so, although it is often done in the name of humanity and kindness, and out of consideration for the feelings of friends. The special Biblical injunction against it.

Mary E. B., Sullivan, Ind. The familiar "charity begins at home," is not found in the Bible and the author is unknown; but it is probably based on I Tim. 5: 4, "Let the first to show piety at home"—having respect both to charity and religious training.

B. F. B., Allentown, Pa. It is usually speculated on what would have happened if the first parents had not sinned. With sin came into the world, and in the nature of things every living creature shared in it. 2: 19 relates the story of the creation of the lower animals.

Subscriber, Assiniboia, Sask., Canada: The passages in Lev. 11: 7, 8 and Deut. 14 are from the Levitical laws as to clean and unclean meats, which were promulgated for observance by the people of Israel then sojourning in the wilderness. These laws are still observed to a large extent among the orthodox Jews. It has been claimed that, as a race, they owe their immunity from many diseases to the observance of those early health laws.

J. H., Toronto, Ont. God is not a God of but of good. The passages in Isa. 48: 18 will be applied to the present war situation. Had the nations of Europe really been Christian nations and their leaders governed by Christian principles, their differences would have been adjusted without bloodshed; but when they allowed their evil passions to rule they were left to their own evil inclinations. God's restraining power was withdrawn.

L. H. H., Garland, Texas. There has been much discussion concerning the "seven angels" spoken of in Rev. 1: 20. Commentators say that heavenly angels are not meant, as they could not be charged with responsibility for human delinquencies. There were many powers in each of the larger churches, but there was only one officer in each who could be held to the fullest responsible for its spiritual condition, i. e., the bishop or superintendent. Hence the term "angels" is held to apply to an official, which is not out of harmony with the symbolism of the book of Revelation, as those earthly ministers are as messengers as certainly as the heavenly angels are.

Do Something!

Are you an inspiration in your home?
Are you trying to build up your neighborhood?
Are you doing everything you should to uplift your community?

It is in the power of every man, woman and child reader of the Christian Herald to do and to be all of these.

Janice Day did it in a community that might well have been called Shiftlesstown or Hopelessville and did it so cleverly and unobtrusively that nobody realized until one day they woke up and proclaimed her famous.

Read this book and learn how to Do Something to uplift your own home town.

Janice Day is a real girl, all alive and with a glorious determination to "do things." And she does them too.

After reading the book right through, this is what Mr. Nathaniel C. Fowler of Boston wrote of the heroine:

"Janice Day is one of the purest, sweetest, most natural characters allowed to live within the covers of a book. I never resided in Polktown. I do not know where it is; but if I had lived there a dozen years, I shouldn't know it better than I do today.

"The author has taken a real girl, not an exaggerated type of femininity, placed her in a real country town, and made her do real things.

"The book is an inspiration and no one can read it, whether he is as old as I am, or as young as Janice, without having some of the good stick to him, and without feeling that there is a lot of good in this bad world of ours, which would rather rise to the surface than stay under ground."

$2 We will send you, postpaid, copy of "Janice Day" and the Christian Herald for one full year for only $2.00. Or, we will send to old subscribers, FREE, a copy of "Janice Day" as a reward for sending in their own renewals and one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald, together with $3.00. $2

CONGOLEUM RUGS

For every room in the house—

A New Process

Congoleum Rugs are made by a new and wonderful process. We believe housewives will find them far superior to any of the medium-priced grass, fibre, or fabric rugs now on the market.

Special Features

Congoleum Rugs are absolutely sanitary. They do not fade in the sun. They lie flat and never "kick up". The way to clean them is to wash them; for they are waterproof.

Beautiful Patterns

Some idea of the beautiful patterns may be obtained from the illustrations herewith, but the richness and depth of colorings cannot be reproduced, and to fully appreciate the good value you must see the Rugs themselves.

We have patterns suitable for every room in the house where a moderate priced rug is required. For porch use, these Rugs are particularly appropriate, as you do not have to take them up when it rains or when you clean the porch, as water does not hurt them in the slightest.

Other Advantages

Many dealers throughout the country are recommending Congoleum Rugs in place of linoleum by the yard, which has to be cut and accurately fitted, and unless the job is well done it buckles and is unsatisfactory. When you buy Congoleum Rugs you have none of these troubles—just lay them on the floor—they don't even need fastening—they lie so flat and perfect.

Sizes and Prices

Congoleum Rugs are made in all the popular sizes, square and oblong. Prices in the United States east of the Rocky Mountains, for Rugs illustrated, or any other patterns, as follows:

1 yard x 1 yard	$.60 each
1 yard x 1½ yards	.90 "
1 yard x 2 yards	1.20 "
1½ yards x 1½ yards	1.35 "
1½ yards x 2 yards	1.80 "
2 yards x 2 yards	2.40 "
2 yards x 3 yards	3.60 "
2 yards x 4 yards	4.80 "

Congoleum Two-piece Rugs

Undoubtedly the most novel Rug on the market today is the Congoleum two-piece Rug, which is a real achievement. The rug is made in two pieces for easy handling and has the so-called "invisible seam", so that when it is laid on the floor it matches perfectly. These two-piece Rugs are ideal for dining room, bed room and porch use. Prices:

3 yards x 4 yards	$7.50 each
3½ yards x 4 yards	8.50 "

Remember the name "Congoleum" for there is nothing else like these Rugs. The name "Congoleum" is stamped on the back of every Rug. Look for it when you buy and be sure to get the genuine.

Handsome Rug Chart Free

If you are interested write to us for handsome Rug Chart, in colors, from which you can make selection and get your dealer to supply you with the Rugs you desire.

Congoleum Rug Borders

We also make an attractive line of Rug Borders, which are exact imitations of finely grained quartered oak. These may be had in bright or dull finish, light oak, golden oak, and in parquet designs. They cannot be told from real wood.

Congoleum Floor Coverings

We make about 50 different patterns, in all the latest shades and colorings, suitable for every room in the house. Congoleum is far superior to printed linoleum because it requires no fastening, lies flat, and is absolutely waterproof. Circulars covering Rug Borders or Floor Coverings free on request.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

A WEEKLY ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER FOR THE HOME

EDITORIAL NOTE.—Early one foggy morning in September, 1909, Earl E. Dudding, of Huntington, W. Va., shot and killed his uncle, Ira Chapman. The killing was the outcome of a series of family differences, according to Mr. Dudding, who maintained both before and after his trial that it was done in self-defense and that he had not the slightest wish to take the life of his uncle. Mr. Dudding was highly respected in Huntington, W. Va., where he was a merchant of influence. Numerous, indeed, were his friends and it was sure that everybody would regard the event in the light of an unavoidable occurrence that it penetrated his head that he would not be set free. Wherefore, the imprisonment of five years in the penitentiary at Moundsville dropped on him like a thunderclap. It is of his sentence, five years out of which he spent them in isolation and what he did to reform his companions in durance, that we tell in the following article.]

GUILTY!

Is there one other word in the English language or any other language that hold so much sinister implication, that can so swiftly bridge the chasm between hope and despair? To me the verdict was the very height of injustice, for I knew what the others might believe, that I had not my uncle only to save my own life; that if I had not done so, I would have been killed myself. Oh! how the horror of that September morning came back to me as I related it at the trial! I could hear my uncle insisting that I accompany him to his office on the second floor of the passenger station. I could see him rush angrily upstairs onto the street, and then, when I followed reluctantly, my hands in my pockets, how he rushed at me with a pick-handle, raised ready to strike. I was too astonished to make any resistance at the moment. I threw up my hands and yelled out, "Don't hit me, uncle!" But the pick-handle caught me on the forehead. I fell into the doorway and he struck me four or five times while I lay there. He was perfectly mad. Finally I got about myself up, and he struck me again cutting down my left eye. He got to my hands and started toward the hall, and almost reached the door of the hall, crawling as fast as I could. But he ran and shoved me or shut with the pick-handle, meantime striking me across the back. He used the pick-handle like a flail, but the hall was narrow and as he aimed any blows at me, the end of the handle would strike the wall, lessening the force of the blow. My arms were black and blue.

I did not thought of the situation up to that moment, but when I realized the determination of the man, I managed to crawl to my feet, jerked my overcoat open and got the pistol out of my pocket. He still came at me. I pointed the pistol into his face and walked backward the full length of the hallway, at least thirty or forty feet, telling him I would shoot if he didn't stop. I finally got into the east room. He struck me on the neck and I fell into a corner. As I fell, the pistol exploded. I think I was down on the floor when I fired the shot, but I cannot tell for certain. I could hardly see for blood. (I had fallen under a table.) Blood was coming out of my made an effort to get it. I gave it a kick and sent it clear out into the hall. Finally I got the pick-handle away from him and hit him on the forehead. He went over backward.

I ran out, grabbing the pistol as I went, and rushed into the street. As I ran away my uncle came to the win-terrific battle. They found my hat under the table, lying in a pool of blood. My uncle's bleeding was all internal. They took him to the hospital and gave him an anesthetic and operated upon him, but he died two hours after from internal hemorrhage. The only statement he ever made concerning the affair prior to his death was (when asked what was the matter), "Earl shot me."

So I was taken to jail! For several days my life hung in the balance. My pulse went as high as 130. During twenty-six days twenty physicians had reported to the court that in all probability I would not survive. I was released on bail from the first of November, 1909, to February 7, 1910. My trial lasted six days, beginning February 7. There are thousands of men who believe that I was improperly convicted, and even the judge of the court afterward told me that he believed everything I had sworn to on the stand. And later the court stenographer wrote a letter to the governor in my behalf in which he said that he had never seen evidence so distorted as it was in this case. Nevertheless, my appeal to the Circuit Court for a new trial was refused and I had to go to the penitentiary. Meanwhile, my wife lay ill in bed and there was very little money to buy food for my family.

POLITICS figured in this trial, of course. I had been a hard opponent of the "wets" in our section and I had made some enemies. I was never really in jail in Huntington. I had a room in the jailor's apartment and during my stay there I received over 1,500 people as visitors, which goes to show how much sympathy my case had awakened among the better classes of the community. I was never without visitors from early morning until late at night. My friends were streaming in and out of the jail all of the time.

After the new trial was refused I demanded to be taken to the penitentiary at Moundsville, as I could stand the strain no longer. The sheriff had arranged to take me out, but the clerk of the penitentiary was there, and the sheriff told the clerk that he would hand me over to him provided he would not handcuff me. The clerk refused to be responsible for me unless I was handcuffed, so the sheriff told him to take me at his risk.

Perhaps it was the strangest prison entry ever made. The sheriff drove me over to the depot and left me there until the clerk of the penitentiary arrived. I stayed at the depot for half an hour waiting for the officer to come. Between two and three hundred friends came down to bid me good-by. I did not feel inconvenienced in the slightest. It was just as though I was about to take a pleasant trip on the train. I waited around the depot until the clerk arrived with two other prisoners. They boarded the train and as it started I stood on the step and waved goodbye to my friends. During the trip I went backwards and forwards through the train at my own pleasure.

eyes and face. I was the bloodiest man you ever saw. I wiped the blood out of my eyes with my hands.

Finally I saw my chance to clinch him. I dropped the pistol on the floor and grabbed him by the legs, and pulled him close to the table above me.

dow, and called for some one to stop me. I went to the doctor's office and had my wounds dressed, after which I called up police headquarters and told them I was ready to surrender. The chief of police came up and arrested me.

HERE, IN THE WEST VIRGINIA PENITENTIARY, DUDDING GOT HIS VISION OF SERVICE

I grabbed his pick-handle with one hand and he dragged me bodily from under the table. We were all over that room, wrestling for that handle during the next five minutes. In the course of our struggles each of us stepped on the pistol and finally he

At police headquarters we went over the whole affair. I told my story, and they sent out men to investigate it. They reported that the physical evidence bore out my story; that the condition of the furniture and the room showed that there had been a

The warden met me outside the prison, shook hands with me and greeted me very cordially. They took the handcuffs off the other prisoners and sent them to the South Hall. The warden knew that I had been in bad health; in fact, I could swallow nothing but milk; so he ordered me conducted to the hospital, meantime telling me to loaf around for a few days and get acquainted with the institution. Of course I would have been sent to a cell had I been well.

Before going into the hospital I was sent to the state shop, where incoming prisoners must exchange their street clothes for prison garb. That was the most trying ordeal I had gone through. When I pulled off my citizen's clothes it required all the nerve and energy I could command to keep me from breaking down. I have no language to describe how awful it seemed to me. It meant the difference between a free man and the convict.

The officer in charge went through my belongings and gave me back almost all the little trinkets I had—my pocket-book, my knife. (It was unusual for a prisoner to be permitted to carry a knife, a knife being a weapon.) The putting on of these clothes was the beginning of several days of the worst mental agony I ever experienced. I could not eat, I could not sleep. I managed to keep my face straight, but that was about all. I entered the prison on a bright May day, with the sun shining outside, lending all the more contrast to the misery and gloom within. The prison band in the yard played popular airs, some of which I knew before I was sent to prison. They did not attract me at all.

At first they put me at the "black-board," in the dining room of the penitentiary. A man was detailed to pick out news from the daily papers—items that would have special interest for the prisoners—and these were printed with chalk on the board, as some of the men could not read writing. I went to the board and tried to scribble upon it, but my physical condition was such that I was unable to do so. I went to the captain and told him about it. He was very kind and relieved me of the duty, telling me to write a few bugs, rats and everything that would help to make a filthy place. The walls were in bad condition; the sewage-disposal arrangements were worse.

After I had been in the hospital four or five days the doctor said to me: "You are able to get around, so we are going to give you a little work to do in the hospital. It will be your job to go around the halls and get the sick reports." I did so, visiting patient after patient, taking the names and

He wanted to know what the vermin. I told him I would make a preparation to kill the roaches; he told me to work in the hospital with my aggressive nature.

Men lay dying of tuberculosis and other diseases in that hospital. The beds in the wards were chequered with springs in them. There were two wards containing thirty beds each, divided between them; one for colored and one for white. This left about twenty men to a room hard as a rock, about a foot square. I had to go to the warden about this, and presently the warden began to make it hard for me.

I was living on a diet of milk and sugar, which was nished by the hospital. I began to cut down the allowance of milk until I got so low there was not enough to sustain me. I complained to the doctor, but he said no good. I went to the warden again and he eased me up a bit; but I suffered from the enmity of the warden. There was nothing to do to make it uncomfortable for me. For instance, I made a trail up the pole of syrup and sugar, and secured a quantity of it and trailed them to the middle of the sprinkled some sugar. After being in bed half an hour I could feel a netting all over me. I grew alarmed over my condition; such surroundings one's mind becomes highly excited. I was going to die. I got up and the lamp and discovered hundreds of thousands of red ants over me. The hospital was full of ants. I just cleaned up my said nothing. What was the result?

letters to my friends and see if I couldn't chase the clouds away in that manner.

As it was I could go anywhere inside of the walls of the prison, and that was my opportunity to observe the condition of the prison as it then existed. I associated with the men, observed their physical condition, the sanitary (?) arrangements of the prison, visited the shops and especially noted the condition of the hospital. The hospital was full of roaches, bed-reports on the charts and the condition of the patients. That gave me a still better opportunity to observe how things were conducted in the hospital. After a while I got to be an all-round handy man.

The vermin were so bad I could not sleep at night, so I got four empty cans, filled them with water, and put the bed-posts in the cans of water to keep the bugs from getting at me at night. I went to the warden and told him of the conditions in the hospital.

NOT many years ago, Biblical critics declared in unmistakable terms that a code of laws could not have been written in the time of Moses. That age was regarded as entirely too early for such a code to have been created. In 1901 the code of Hammurabi was found, which was written six or seven centuries prior to the time of Moses. It was then declared by many of the same critics that this was the origin of the Mosaic code.

One of the results of Biblical archeology is that many of the elements of the Hebrew culture, which were regarded in the past as peculiarly Hebraic, are found to have had their origin in antiquity. This is true as regards the Mosaic code. In other words, the culture of today is based upon that of yesterday. Not that it must be admitted from the evidence advanced that there is a direct bearing of the Mosaic upon the Hammurabi code, but there is every reason to believe that the Hebrew lawgiver codified these laws that were being practiced by the people and which he could sanction. This is illustrated by the recent discovery of laws older than the Hammurabi code.

The discovery of the Babylonian code, known as the Hammurabi code, is regarded as the greatest that has been made in any land for decades. The original is one of the treasures of the Louvre. It was cut on a large, irregular, diorite stone, standing about eight feet high. Fragments of another stele have been found, besides clay tablets, containing portions of the code.

The code contains a prologue, followed by two hundred and eighty-two sections of laws and an epilogue. The laws cover almost every phase of life. Such subject matter is treated as witchcraft, bribery, kidnapping, slavery, laws relating to landlords, tenants, creditors, debtors, licenses, slander, marriage, divorce, desertion, breach of promise, unchastity, inheritance, fees of surgeons and builders and their responsibilities, etc. This code, studied in connection with the thousands of documents containing contracts of an official and personal nature, as well as the letters and other inscriptions of the period, enables the decipherer and the historian to reconstruct the life of ancient Babylonia, two thousand years before Christ, in a way that cannot be done for some centuries of our Christian era.

As it has been inferred that the Mosaic code was based upon existing laws, so it was natural for scholars knowing the contract literature and the history of the times to conclude that other codes existed prior to the time of Hammurabi, upon which his code was based. The phraseology employed and the fact that Sumerian laws were quoted in the contracts of an earlier period, made it clear that such had been the case, but the actual existence of such laws could not be proved.

Within recent months the Yale Babylonian collection secured a tablet which, when it arrived, was heavily encrusted from being buried for more than four thousand years in earth impregnated with salt. After the tablet was cleaned it proved to belong to a period earlier than that of Hammurabi and to contain laws written in the Sumerian language, the language of Southern Babylonia prior to its conquest by the Semites or Accadians in the time of Hammurabi.

THE SUMERIAN TABLET

Most of the in the known text has yielded to the efforts that have been made to decipher it and the translation will shortly be published in a volume of texts in the Yale collection. It contains legislation concerning accidental and intentional injury to men, the repudiation of children, perhaps by their parents; elopement; the hire of boats and animals; and, like the code of Hammurabi, it provides compensation for the killing of a hired man.

The tablet, moreover, considered in connection with the code of Hammurabi, shows that it is a prototype of that code. While the Hammurabi code treats the same subject matter that is covered by the Sumerian, it would be impossible to say whether the former was dependent upon the latter or vice versa. For one instance: the first law on the tablet of the Sumerian tablet (which unfortunately is the only side preserved) reads: "If (a man) strikes the daughter of a man [and she sustain serious internal injuries therefrom] he shall pay ten shekels of silver." The second law reads: "If (a man) strikes the daughter of a man [and she sustain serious internal injuries therefrom] he shall pay one-third of a mina of silver (twenty shekels)." In other words, one law legislates concerning accidental injury and the other intentional. The two laws are condensed into one form in the Hammurabi code. Section 209 reads: "If a man strikes the daughter of a man [and she sustain serious internal injuries] he shall pay ten shekels of silver."

The penalty, namely, the payment of ten shekels in the Hammurabi code is taken from the first mentioned law of the Sumerian code, in which accidental injury is referred to; but the law of striking with intention to injure, found in the Hammurabi code, is taken from the second law of the Sumerian, where the offense is more seriously dealt with. Although one code is written in Sumerian and the other in Semitic Babylonian or Accadian, it seems that the details, as well as the phraseology, are such that no other conclusion can be reached than that the former was a prototype of the latter.

This, it seems to the writer, is but an indication of what will probably be found in the Mosaic laws, if the early Canaanite laws should ever be discovered.

CARNEGIE AND ROCKEFELLER BEFORE THE COMMISSION underlying the various foundations which he has established has been his desire to devote a portion of his fortune to the service of his fellow man.

As to the safeguards necessary to prevent such institutions as his foundations from becoming a menace to the public, he said: "I regard the right to amend and rescind the respective charters of the several foundations which inhere in the legislative bodies which granted them as an entirely sufficient guarantee against serious abuse of the funds. Furthermore, I have such confidence in democracy that I believe it can better be left to the people and their representatives to remedy the evils when there is some tangible reason for believing they are impending rather than restricting the power for service in anticipation of hypothetical dangers." He repeated the opinion expressed by his son as to the responsibility of investigators and directors for the labor conditions existing in the corporations in which they are interested. "I think that the stockholders are responsible for the choice of the best men as directors. The directors are responsible for the general conduct of the business and in discharging that responsibility it is their duty to select the best men administering it. These administrative officers must have discretion and power commensurate with their responsibility. And large stockholders ordinarily have more influence with the board of directors than the smaller one, and consequently would have a greater responsibility for the selection of directors, who would see to it that the administrative officers maintained proper working conditions for their employees." Mr. Rockefeller stated that he could not imagine that any institution coming under the educational class would be likely to alter its avowed principles or previous methods of procedure to receive his gifts, although it had been his experience that colleges had given up their denominational connections in order to secure grants from great foundations. Mr. Rockefeller expressed the opinion that the interests of the public are as well protected by the present charters of his foundation as if it was under Federal control. "What the future might develop," he added, "would have to be for the future." Mr. Rockefeller stated: "I would accord to all men the right to organize themselves—the workman and the business man as well—with the proper limitations in respect to safeguarding the interests of the public or parties concerned. As to permitting workers to participate in the profits, I believe the best way to help the laboring men is to give them steady work and wages which they can earn—fair wages. I believe that that is better than any and all of the charities. And I believe that the good laboring men would prefer to have the labor and their honorable positions rather than to have any charity.

"I shall be very happy to see the laborers gradually become the owners of these same prosperous businesses to which you refer. I should be only too happy to surrender my holdings in part or in any or all that the laborers might come into the relation to the enterprise and have their representation on boards of directors according to their ownership, just the same as all other shareholders, thus giving them the profits to which you referred; giving them in addition to their labor these handsome profits which you are having in mind. I should be very happy to have them get these profits and feel that they were my partners."

Mr. Rockefeller seconded the position taken by his son that "workers should be allowed to work under such conditions as they should choose and that the employer must stand by his loyal men."

foreman who was inclined to make trouble should stick to his contract. Another threatened disturbance was averted by a joke with one of his workmen. Quoting from his article "The Gospel of Wealth," published in the North American in 1888, Mr. Carnegie said: "The time is not far distant when the man who dies leaving behind him millions of available wealth which were free for him to administer during life will pass away unwept, unhonored and unsung, no matter to what use he leaves the dross which he cannot take with him. Of such as this the public verdict will then be 'The man who dies thus rich will die disgraced.'" He stated that upon retiring from business his first act was to give five million dollars to the workers of the Carnegie Steel Company, four million for pensions to the men, one million for the maintenance of the libraries and halls he had built.

On being questioned by the commissioners, Mr. Carnegie acknowledged that the directors should look into labor conditions, when apprised of any difficulty. As a director in an institution he would take it for granted that everything is running well if the president and officers do not apprise of trouble. He said that he believed in the right of men to organize and to bargain collectively with their employers. He was always glad to confer with men representing organizations of workmen. It was here that he delighted the audience and spectators by the statement made in answer to the question whether such dealing with the workmen was usually the means of establishing peace. "Undoubtedly," he replied. "I know them by name, and I delighted—and you see, behind my back they always called me 'Andy.' I like that, and I would rather have it than 'Andrew' or 'Mr. Carnegie,' there is no sympathy to that. But you have your men calling you 'Andy' and you can get along with them." Asked if he considered the possibility of the foundation exercising undue influence upon institutions receiving its benefits he said: "I cannot imagine such a thing as that possible." Mr. Carnegie declared that he would welcome supervisory control over the foundations by state or federal government, and believed that full publicity should be given to the activities of the foundations. He declared that he could see no danger in interlocking directorates, having the idea that if a man served well in one position of responsibility that would qualify him in a similarly responsible position.

John D. Rockefeller presented a striking contrast to Mr. Carnegie upon the witness stand. He was very grave, and after reading the written answers which he had prepared, answered quietly and thoughtfully further questions put to him by the commissioners. He declared that the sole motive

THE WAITING HOUR

BY ELIZABETH BURGESS HUGHES

A HARLAND came down the hospital steps he noticed abstractedly that it had begun to rain. It had been chill and numb, as to weather, in the early morn but no hint of rain; and that morn when he entered the hospital he thought vaguely that the air outwardly visualized the illness and somberness of his own condition. Marjorie ill—perhaps on the brink of the unknown—why, it didn't seem possible. Only last morn the little girl, his only child, was so strong; today she stood very near the portals of that mysterious threshold through which her mother had gone.

He turned up his coat collar and shivered a little as he hesitated on the steps in the rain. A sharp, stinging little wind blew up against him. The sky was like a tremendous sheet of dull metal. The world was dun-colored and hopeless, as was his soul. The operation was to be at ten; it was now eight. They had asked him to go. The strain was too terrible up there in the reception room, with its blank green walls. He must be moving, doing—the stillness and silence were unbearable.

The rain deepened as he walked down the street. His face was set; his eyes looked rather blank in the dull light; his step along the slippery pavement was shuffling and uncaring. People glanced at him, then looked away. It is the happy face, the upturned mouth corners, that attract. He was like a tragic mask of suffering; and he could no more have smiled than he could have sung. He seemed struck silent over night.

At last the wet streets and the mechanical pacing wearied him; he turned into his own cheap boarding house and went lifelessly up the steps to the small, chill room where he had battled with himself hours ago. He looked about the place slowly. Its cold bareness repulsed him.

Merciful heavens! he must do something—he could not go on like this. He should be at work. For days he had done nothing, and expense was mounting hourly. If only he weren't a writer, picking up his living at a pen's point! It would have been better if he were a ditch-digger. Hard muscular

THE CHRISTIAN LIFE

A SERMON

BY

Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman, D.D.*

"Who gave himself for us, that he might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works." Titus 2: 14

THIS Epistle to Titus is a tender, affectionate message, written by the apostle Paul to his son in the Gospel. It is filled with sound advice, which, if followed, would revolutionize a community and the church. While all the epistle is inspired and all of it is beautiful, yet there are gems in it, as for example, Titus 1: 15, "Unto the pure all things are pure; but unto them that are defiled and unbelieving is nothing pure; but even their mind and conscience is defiled"; and Titus 2: 7, 8, "In all things showing thyself a pattern of good works; in doctrine showing uncorruptness, gravity, sincerity, sound speech, that cannot be condemned; that he that is of the contrary part may be ashamed, having no evil thing to say of you."

When Peter writes concerning Christ, he says that he is our example, but when Paul writes to Titus, he tells him to be a pattern. A pattern is that which may be reproduced exactly, but an example that which must be reproduced in spirit. We are not able to live exactly as Christ did; for he was in the Orient, and we are in this far different country; but we may have his spirit in all things, while on the other hand, it is true that as we live in this world, so others may live. It has both an encouraging and a discouraging aspect; encouraging because in proportion as we are holy we may influence others; discouraging in that our imperfections are imitated and because of them men frequently go astray.

Another gem is found in the second chapter, the 11th to the 13th verses, "For the grace of God that bringeth salvation hath appeared to all men, teaching us that, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously and godly in this present world; looking for that blessed hope and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ." Grace is love in action, and the closing part of the Scripture quoted above leads us to look for him who shall one day appear, and at whose appearing we shall be like him. The word peculiar in the text may be interpreted in different ways.

A Purchased People

It would seem almost as if greater love were demanded on the part of the Father to give his Son to die for us, than on the part of the Son to yield himself, just as the sacrifice must have been greater on the part of the parents who in Europe are giving their sons to fight and possibly to die for their country than on the part of the sons who as they fight are inspired by the enthusiasm of battle and the inspiration of the soldier's life; but in different places it is also said that he gave himself, and we have only to study the Scriptures to realize how free was that gift. He might have shirked the responsibility, and it might have been possible in some other way to have saved the world; but he freely and fully gave himself that we might live, and it is not to be forgotten that he knew what his sufferings were to mean. He was the Lamb, slain from the foundation of the world. Suffering is worse in anticipation than in its realization; and if we knew that within three months God would take our property, our children, our dear ones, we would almost welcome the falling of the blow that our hearts might break, if break they must. He knew from the beginning the pains of his life of self-denial and the agony of the Garden of Gethsemane and the humiliation of the cross, and yet he went forward delighted even to do the will of God.

When God would create the world he has only to speak and it is done, but when he would redeem the world, he must part with his beloved Son, and he in turn must be content with the manger in Bethlehem, the life in Nazareth, the agony of Gethsemane and the bloody sweat, and his unspeakable suffering upon the cross. This purchase price also gives God's estimate of our worth, for we were redeemed, not with corruptible things, such as silver and gold, but with the precious blood of Christ. How ought we to live therefore? In the Old Testament times when the blood of consecration was put upon the priest it was upon the ear, then upon the hand and finally upon the foot. Man ordinarily reverses that order and therefore unduly magnifies service; but with God it is upon the ear that we may first hear; upon the hand that we may appropriate God's gift; upon the foot that we may walk in his ways. This is ever the divine order and is most significant.

The story is told of a missionary who, to his horror, saw that one of his servants was in danger of death. He threw up his hands quickly and received in his own arm the arrow that was intended for the heart of his servant and thus saved his life. The man prostrated himself at his feet, then rose and threw his arms about him and said, "I am your slave from this time on forever." How ought we to live, who have upon us the blood of Christ? The hand that has been touched must lay hold of no thing that is against Christ; the ear that has been marked with blood must listen to no charge that is against him; the foot which has been consecrated must walk in no way that would be against his plan for us. Well may St. Paul say, "I beseech you therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service." (Rom. 12: 1.)

A Possessed People

Christ with us, by which we understand that we are completely identified with Christ. He is our substitute and sacrifice; in God's plan we were crucified with him, buried with him, raised with him, and are now seated with him; but it is also true that he is with us in every time of trouble and of need, and will be with us until the end; naught can separate us from his love. Christ for us. He is our High Priest and Advocate at the right hand of God, making intercession for us, calling to remembrance his life of sacrifice and substitution.

We may not live as if we were his, but as a matter of fact we are. God gave us to him and we gave ourselves to him; it may have been years ago, but we yielded to him, as we well remember; and in addition to all this, he redeemed us. I cannot but feel that because we are possessed of Christ, our lives should be far different from what they are.

We are a people of a great possession. Certain things that belong to him are ours, because he is ours. His life is ours. It is not an intermittent life, weak one day and strong the next, but, when given the right of way, is ever overflowing in sweetness and blessing. His peace is ours. "My peace I give unto you," he said: not a peace like his, nor a peace that he had purchased, but his own peace; what a wonderful possession in these days of turmoil and strife! His joy is ours. "These things I have spoken unto you," he said, "that my joy might remain in you and that your joy might be full." We are a people having so great a possession in all things spiritual that our lives certainly ought to be more fruitful.

A Peculiar People

John Robertson, the great Scotch preacher, has said that in the East dress is still a symbol or sign of one's position. To alter one's robe was to alter one's faith. So the Christian has a distinct dress. It is the imputed righteousness of Christ; not a thread of it is made on earth; the crimson in it is the blood, while the luster upon it is the mark of the throne. Have we not come to a time now when, in our living, the demand has been made upon us that we should dress as the world dresses, not in the clothing we wear, but in our habits of thought and our manners of life? and is it not true that too often there is very little difference between us and the world? Have we not come to a time when, in the preaching, we are told not to mention so frequently the inspiration of the Bible, the sacrifice of Christ, his imputed righteousness, and if we consent it will save us from the reproach of the world? But alas, if we follow this advice, we should then be as the world is, and we should be shorn of our power.

There were national dishes provided in the olden times and there were certain things that God's people could not eat. The same is true today as in other days. Is it not true that we feed too much upon other things than those provided, upon those that are questionable, trashy literature, etc. is only one sure test as to whether a thing is right or wrong. It is this: Does it deaden our for better and holier things? The Word is our guide, yet how few of us read it! T even those of us who preach read it, not personal, spiritual profit, but that we mig others; and this is a mistake, for both ar sary. What a commotion a man would i in one of our crowded trains, he should reading his Bible! The Old Testament was peculiar because he had no abiding sought one to come. He was content to tents because he knew he lived in another la. We ought to have the same spirit; with a C sian every pull of his heart ought to be heav ward, Godward, Christward; and if we are too m tered upon the things of the world, it is r a good indication that we are not where Go wants us to be.

A blind boy was seen flying a kite on a c mon, and a passing traveler said to him, "My b do you fly the kite, when you cannot s it?" Turning up a little face that was just shir he said, "I like to feel the tug of it." And t picture for a Christian. Every tug of hi ought to be upward. Therefore, in the way w that is, in our habits of thought and the ma our life; in the food we eat, that is, in the we think about and the books we read, there which helps us to build up our spiritual cha cter. It ought to be true that in everything we a seeking to become a peculiar people.

There are but two ways to live in this one is for God, the other is against him; on accordance with his will, the other is in ut regard of what he desires for us. A life God is incomplete, unsatisfactory, and in t is despair. It would be far better to yield him. The world may class us as peculiar, but G will look upon us as a very special treasure.

Then,—A Zealous People

To become a Christian there are certain ings we must remember: "Ye who sometime we afar off are made nigh by the blood of Christ." The debt has been paid, the sacrifice has been pre ted, the provision is abundant. We may have wa eed far. We may have sinned times without nber —it does not matter. It is now possible, b ause of all that Christ has done, for God to be ju and the Justifier of them that believe. We ne not wait for the way to clear up and our dou disappear. Nor need we tarry, with the hope t we may grow better; nor need we expect that i ou ever be easier than now to become a Christia old hymn declares: "My God is reconciled, h pardoning voice I hear," and because he is reccl ed, we need only to come to him and fully trust i him.

"Behold, now is the accepted time; behold now is the day of salvation."

It is quite easy to explain why it is so cult for people in more mature life to become Chri ans. They have resisted God for so long a time they have rejected his grace so often; they hav said "No" to him so frequently, and all the tim they are drifting, and all the time their indifferen is becoming more and more like open rebellion. Now is the safest time to come, because there i no promise for any other time; the easiest tin because each resistance pushes him farther fr u and makes us feel less and less our need for im; God's time, because all through his Word e is calling the wanderer to come home. His l is "come" in Genesis, and it is also found in Rela tion and in all the books lying between thi first book in the Old Testament and the last book the New Testament.

The way of life has been plainly indicat in his Word. It is like this:

(1) Repent. This is not sorrow for sin nor remorse on account of sin; if sorrow and remorse be the end of our concern, it is rather such s row as would lead us to turn from sin and unto C.

(2) Believe. This is not simply to give tel- lectual assent to the statements made in id's

The Treasury of Prayer

WEDNESDAY, February 28. II Thessalonians 3: 1. Pray for us, that the word of the Lord may be glorified. And so it is that the people of one talent can help the men endowed with many. They can be fellow-laborers in a common crucible. The slave Onesimus can co-operate with the free of the Gentiles. Obscure folk can be in the forefront of the great. By prayer I can have part in the work of the preacher, and help to wing his words with the mysterious power of the Holy Spirit. By prayer, I can visit the lonely missionary, even though I remain at home. I, too, can be a worker on the foreign field. By prayer, I can visit one I can sit in cabinets with statesmen, I can influence the editorial office, and influence the articles in the daily press.

What a privilege, then, is mine, and also what a duty! And how little and rarely I use my power. If there had been committed to me a mysterious influence over men's bodies, by which I could impart strength to those who are weak and faint, I only indifferently used the power, how great would my condemnation! But a much more precious gift is mine. I can be the strengthener of men's souls. And with this gift I am free from the limitations of space, for in a moment I can cross continents and seas, and carry resource, by the gift of God, to his servants in the remotest parts of the earth. I can be up, my soul, and use thy wonderful power. Make thy journeys round the planet, help thy servants of the Lord, enriching their minds and hearts, and giving to men and women in every generation surprises of inspiration. J. H. J.

How We May Lighten the Cares of Life

TODAY, March 1. Isaiah 9: 1-7. "Of the increase of his government and of peace there shall be no end." We must put the government of the Father and of all that belongs to us on the strong ruler of the Son of God, who is described in these words, and immediately we shall enter into the peace of God's peace will begin to keep our hearts in peace. The measure of consecration is the measure of peace. As we increase the one, we shall receive a deepening increase of the other. Give up all, and immediately the fret and care of life will disappear, the hard lines of your face will soften, and a song will come into your heart that has not known for years.

Philosophy became the keynote of one of the strongest and noblest men of this generation. He could not give an address in which it did not form a part. Amid the stress of vast business operations, and the throng of important responsibilities, he went forward. Having committed all to Christ, he came from Christ. When dying in the glorious agony of his manhood, his devoted wife heard him whisper: "The government shall be upon his ruler." And as she knelt beside the lifeless body, her first agony of her grief had spent itself, and she put the government of her all where her husband had placed it, and the peace of God in her life became the marvel of all who knew her.

Is it too much for you to experience? Do your cares seem too entangled? Nay, verily! The zeal of the Lord of Hosts will perform this for you also. F. B. M.

God's Word an Unfailing Refuge

TUESDAY, March 2. John 6: 63. "The words that I have spoken unto you are spirit and are life." According to Jesus' teachings, the Bible should be a dry book. It is alive with the vitality of the message of the Son of God to the sons of men. It is our attitude to the Bible that is often at fault, not the method or lack of method in its study.

Try today to read a chapter or two of the Bible as though you were reading it for the first time. Ask, "What do the words actually say?" not "What have we always supposed they said?" Let us try to receive the words of Jesus as simply as he spoke them. Take the great practical suggestions and promises of Christ as real, as the impelling force driving you out to glad and useful service. Take the Bible for your cares, your worries and your sorrows. Believe it and apply it. It has been a panacea for a world's grief. You will find in it what the world has not found, "a refuge in a time of storm." Believe unflinchingly that God is a God of love, that he has a particular will for you, for your own individual happiness.

In his will is our peace.

Remember that God makes no distinction in his all-embracing care. As the mountains are round about Jerusalem, so the love of the Father is round about his own.

Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace,
Whose mind is stayed on thee.

If we fail to get such vitalizing and life-giving inspirations from the words of Jesus, either our hearts are harboring wrong thoughts or our method of studying the Bible is faulty. Christ said, "I came to give life," and every influence of his words and teaching should be radiant with peace and hope. C. S. C.

Walking in the Light

WEDNESDAY, March 3. John 4: 15-30. "Must we worship him in spirit and in truth." If you know yourself, you know that you have an affinity to God on the one side, as you have to the earth on the other. That affinity toward God is your spirit, and there you must meet him. In prayer, accustom yourself to turn inward. Pass through the outer court with the many voices into the stillness, where God is, and there worship. He dwells between the cherubim. The Shekinah shines above the Ark of the secret Covenant. The still small voice speaks in the Horeb-cave of the soul.

There are two conditions for finding God within. First, we must be true. God is light and in him is no darkness at all. If we walk in the light as he is in the light, we have fellowship one with another. If there is any deceit, duplicity, or hypocrisy in our walk or conversation, we shall not be able to realize the presence of the Lord God, or, like our first parents, shall hide ourselves from it. Only he that is of the truth can hear the voice of the King of Truth, and he desires truth in the inward parts. Second, we must love. John always links these two together. "The elder unto the elect lady, whom I love in the truth, for the truth's sake, which dwelleth in us, and shall be with us forever." So he writes; and also, "Grace be with you and truth and love." Let us be willing that God's love should fill our hearts towards every one. Then when the heart is transparent and loving, it will become the shrine of God—his secret place. However unquiet the circumstances of our life may be, we can always turn into the holy calm of our spirit, and find God's spirit there. F. B. M.

Covetousness a Root of Evil in the Heart

THURSDAY, March 4. Exodus 20: 17. "Thou shalt not covet." This is one of the commandments that we are inclined to forget or to disregard. It is as binding, as authoritative, as, for example, the sixth commandment: "Thou shalt not kill." There are several things enumerated by way of instance: "Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's house; thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's wife, nor his manservant, nor his maidservant, nor his ox, nor his ass, nor anything that is thy neighbor's."

The sin of covetousness is not a sin of Old Testament times merely; it belongs to the New Testament. Jesus said: "Take heed, and beware of covetousness: for a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth." (Luke 12: 15-22.)

The term also belongs to our own day, and it is at the root of much unhappiness, much unrest and much personal and social iniquity. We know of a man who is fairly miserable over the success of his best friend. In this day the commandment might read: "Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's automobile; thy neighbor's ability to make a large salary; thy neighbor's honor; his trip abroad; thy neighbor's educational advantages; his good looks; his legacy—anything that is thy neighbor's."

Covetousness has its roots in selfishness and in the lack of conception of our own blessings, our own particular talent, or our own work given us by God, which no one but ourselves can possibly accomplish. Henry Drummond was fond of saying that in addition to the will of God for mankind in general, there was a private will of God for every individual according to his individual abilities, environment and education. No one can fulfil this will of God for me. This dignifies me. This satisfies and sets me apart from and above imitation or covetousness of others. "Imitation is suicide," said

Emerson, since it kills our own capabilities, our own mission. The remedy is to keep near enough to God, to realize constantly our own work and God's purpose for us. There is no room for envy in the soul that is filled with the presence of God. Selfishness and unselfishness can not fill the heart at the same time. Today above all my thoughts I will write the words of the tenth commandment: "Thou shalt not covet!" C. S. C.

The Soul's "Hour of Opportunity"

FRIDAY, March 5. Ephesians 5: 1-14. "Awake thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall shine upon thee." To every man, once at least in his life, there comes an hour of glorious opportunity, when the Christ stands beside his bed of sloth, or what threatens to become his grave, and calls to him to awake. That day brings in its hand a diadem or a fagot, the chance of stepping up to wide and wider usefulness, or of sinking lower into apathy and uselessness. There, on the one hand, are royalties, stars, and the heaven that holds them all; on the other hand are frivolity, fashion, money, the praise of men, and what they term success.

Too many take the lesser and are content—content with wood, hay, and stubble, with the bursting soap-bubble, with the passing flattery or laughter of fools and sycophants. But when that unworthy choice is made, Christ turns away, saddened and disappointed.

Alas that any soul, face to face with such opportunities, should show itself unworthy of its high destiny! But if it listen to the divine summons and choose purity, truth, honor, integrity, prayer, self-discipline, ceaseless help to others, which may involve the cross—then Christ shines upon it. The human verdict may be "Failure." But what are human voices, when compared with the love and satisfaction that shine on the face of Jesus? The glory of that smile will irradiate the soul when the sun is turned into darkness, and the moon into blood, and the stars of heaven fall. F. B. M.

The Day When Wars Shall Cease

SATURDAY, March 6. Matthew 24: 6. "And ye shall hear of wars and rumors of wars, but the end is not yet." War is barbarism; peace is civilization. War means force; civilization, freedom. War makes man a machine to kill his brother; peace makes man a power to lift up his fellow man. War means kingly authority, social aristocracy, feudal lordship over the multitude; peace means equality of rights. War looks backward to savagery; peace, forward to brotherhood.

War compels innocent men to become murderers, making them devilish, fascinated by criminal atrocities, drunk with the pleasure of blood. The butcheries of war turn civilization into a slaughterhouse.

But the end is not yet. God is coming. Powder, guns, swords, battleships, bombs, armies, lyddite and dynamite must give way before the presence of the Prince of Peace. War, the monstrous Moloch demon of the devil, that violates and crushes out all rights to life, liberty and happiness, must be abolished by the nations who fear God. Victor Hugo said: "Cannons will one day be exhibited in museums, just as instruments of torture are in prisons and prison ships today." Landseer's celebrated painting was a rusty cannon, with a lamb, in its innocence, looking into the cannon's mouth, as if wondering what the cannon was made for. E. W. C.

The Christian Life

Word. Even the devils believe and tremble. It is to accept, to act upon, so to receive as to make God's will and Word a part of your very being and existence; it is throwing yourself at his feet in utter submissiveness. It is to say: "I yield, I yield; I can hold out no more."

(3) Confess. That is to make known your determination to follow Christ; tell others about it; let it be known that you have surrendered and have no will but his.

(4) Obey. "Whatsoever he saith unto you, do it." To know his will and do it, and to have delight in the same, is true Christian living.

Taking these steps, you will become his special treasure and life will be worth while.

IN THE LAND OF EARTHQUAKES

From Rome to Rome Through the Abruzzi

By Mrs. Gilbert Colgate, New York City

A GLORIOUS country and marvelous roads; but, oh, the hotels! If we had not had the special object of looking into the Waldensian missions on this trip, I fear we would have gone back to Rome after the experience of the first night. It is almost impossible to realize that if we had been in any part of this trip on January 13 we would undoubtedly have felt the earthquake shock and would possibly have also lost our lives.

Our first meal was taken at Tivoli and our first night was spent at Avezzano, one place injured and the other practically obliterated by the recent earthquake. It seems almost like a premonition that, as soon as the proprietor of the little hotel in Avezzano had shown us to our rooms, I turned to my husband with the exclamation, "I am glad we are in this hotel in Avezzano and not in Messina!" I had just returned from a visit to Messina, my second since the earthquake, and the horror of the destruction wrought there was still upon me. As I looked about this room and noticed that the construction of this ancient building, the principal hotel in Avezzano, apparently was of the same kind, stucco and soft stone, as had been the buildings in Messina, only in this case the walls were even more massive, I could not but feel how terrible would be the destruction should an earthquake occur. As there was no Etna or Vesuvius in this part of Italy, I rested quite happily without the slightest fear.

Late in the evening, as I was leaning out of my window overlooking the public garden, across a sill three feet wide, watching the people as they sought their homes, some singing merrily as they passed by, there came to my ears from the church near by the sound of the sweetest chimes I have ever heard, and their music comes back to me now as a requiem over Avezzano.

One thing which impresses one, to one's shame, yes, but also as an inspiration to renewed effort, is the power of the individual life to accomplish what he could, went home and started his work. He carried it on, at his own expense, as long as he possibly could, and then turned it over to the Waldensian Church, the only available agency. When he first went out and tried to sell his portions of Scripture and his Bibles, he was jeered at and tormented. Now he goes out into the public square of the town and calls out in a loud voice, "Who wants to buy the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ?" and every one present takes off his hat in reverence. Lately a petition signed by a hundred people was sent to the mayor of Tocco Casauria, asking permission to start a Waldensian school in connection with the church there.

I dread to think of Chieti, that beautiful city on a plateau overlooking that garden plain to the snow-capped mountains beyond—the picturesqueness of her streets greatly enhanced by the hundreds of artistically gowned students of her schools and seminaries. I have had only meager reports since the earthquake, but enough to know that the charming little Waldensian church, with its pure white walls and its cheerful red and white draperies, has been destroyed. The same thing has happened in Salle, ten miles away, where the work was started by Italians who had returned from America. A large number of members from this church have settled in Astoria, N. Y., where they have started an Italian Methodist church. In both Chieti and Salle the workers have overcome almost insurmountable difficulties by truly Christian sacrifice—the kind of giving which is little known among us, I am afraid; the kind which gives and goes hungry to do it. The church destroyed at Salle was only a few years old. What can the people do? Their houses are in ruins, their church is gone, and there is practically no work to be found. The situation is appalling!

No mountain height seems to phase the Italian Government in its road-building. From Vasto on the Adriatic to the west coast, the state roads are the heaven of the automobilist; but of the provincial roads beware! The soldiers arrived at Vasto just before we did, consequently there was not one bed in the town to be had. The hotel proprietor was greatly distressed, but offered to store our automobile in the front hall of his hotel if we wished to go to Termoli by train, returning in the morning. This offer we accepted, as Termoli was really where we wished to be. The old feudal system seems to be the only excuse for the fact that, though it takes but half an hour by train between these two old walled cities, there is absolutely no road connecting them, and we would have had to go one hundred miles around the country to have reached Termoli from Vasto by automobile.

AT Termoli a school was dismissed to run after and hoot us, because we were Protestants, the crowd gathering as the children shouted, "Away with you, out with you! Down with the Protestants!" A remarkable display of bigotry on the part of the priests, which certainly was not deep-rooted in the hearts of the people, as it was easily overcome by the judicious use of the kodak. Nicolantonio Cannella, of Buffalo, N. Y., has started a fine mission here.

There is no difficulty in climbing with a motor car to the highest of the hill towns.

seems almost impossible. Take for example the next town we visited, Tocco Casauria. In that quaint little town, where the old stage coach is still a prominent factor in its commercial and its social life, is a man who, single-handed, has started a church and Sunday school in the midst of a superstition and ignorance almost unbelievable to an American. Donato Trovarelli is his name, and he became an "evangelical" in a Baptist mission in Albany, N. Y. He was just a day laborer in America; but he saved his money, and, as soon as

Some run like one great street on the top of the mountain, as Agnone, which is wonderfully picturesque. Carunchio, however, is the center of hill town, with its streets winding round until they reach the church at the top of the pinnacle.

On the way you pass the little Waldensian church, where nine years ago one thousand people stoned the congregation, who saved their lives only by escaping through a skylight. Undoubtedly from the government at Rome sixty arms were made and since then there has been no more trouble. Members of this church started the Holy Trinity Presbyterian Church on One Hundred and Third Street, New York City.

As is the custom throughout all Italy, in the Abruzzi: the women wash their clothes in special places provided by the towns for the purpose. Some of these are intensely picturesque. Sometimes it is a diverted, fast-flowing stream with trees for shade when necessary, and other places large fountains like huge marble basins. The women who gather at these places in the Abruzzi are remarkable for strength of character and beauty. Black hair and blue eyes are often found together.

To Americans passing through the Abruzzi, the close connection which exists between the people there and themselves is a great surprise. Not once did our motor car stop without our immediately being accosted by some one in our own language. The conversation would run something like this: "Have you ever lived in America?" "Yes, I been in America, I been in Columbus, Pittsburg, whatever the town might have been). Even with the musical drop of the voice on the last syllable, so characteristic of the Abruzzesi, and then perhaps we would add, "Do you expect to go back?" And the invariable answer would be, "Sure."

We are getting into closer touch with the Italian immigrant than ever before, for the columns of the American Waldensian Aid Society, whose headquarters are at No. 213 West Seventy-sixth Street, New York City, are boarding all steamers leaving the ports of Naples, Genoa and Palermo, selling portions of the Scripture and "Guides to America" to the Italian emigrants before they leave, so that they are admirably employed during the two weeks' trip. To be sure, the English learned from the guide is intelligible, but sometimes it is applied. One man described a headache, "My sick upstairs!"

Before leaving America, through the Immigration Bureau of the same society, the Italian immigrants are put in touch with the Waldensian Church in Rome. For a while these Italians are able to carry on their missions alone, but very soon this becomes impossible, as in the case of the work at Icolanico, where in five weeks Signor Caldo, of Columbus, Ohio, had a church with 130 a part and at his open-air meetings a congregation of 300 or 400.

The Waldensian Church is doing a wonderful work all through this section, and it confidently expects

DIORIAL NOTE. Since the first days of the earthquake horror which stunned

Italy on January 13, but scant news has appeared in the press despatches. Italy is hiding her wound from the world.

One most remarkable experience in the earthquake has been reported, that of Michiel Cairolo, a resident of Paterno, who found himself blocked in a cellar beneath the ruins of a stable, where in total darkness and with only a little trickling water for nourishment he survived for twenty-five days, according to the accounts, most of that time being in a state of coma, and was finally saved by two men who were searching the ruins of their former home for personal property, and whose voices Cairolo heard. It has also been learned that the monastery of Monte Cassino near Naples was badly damaged by the earthquake, and historic treasures of art and literature are endangered by the condition of the building, which the government will restore.

THE RETURN OF POLLYANNA

CHAPTER XVII

WHEN POLLYANNA CAME

THE train neared Beldingsville Pollyanna watched her aunt anxiously. All day Mrs.
Chilton had been growing and more restless, more and re pomy; and Pollyanna was fear-of the time when the old familiar eation should be reached.
s Pollyanna looked at her aunt her rtched. She was thinking that ould not have believed it pos-le that any one could have changed ed so greatly in six short nth. Mrs. Chilton's eyes were terrs, her cheeks pallid and unin and her forehead crossed d crossed by fretful lines. Her uthrooped at the corners, and her r as combed tightly back in the eeking fashion that had been hers en Pollyanna first had seen her rs before. All the softness and eetish that seemed to have come to wh her marriage had dropped mer like a cloak, leaving upper-st the old hardness and sourness t had been hers when she was Miss l Harrington, unloved and unlovly.

"Pollyanna!" Mrs. Chilton's voice s iasive.
Pollyanna started guiltily. She had uncomfortable feeling that her aunt zthave read her thoughts.
"Ye auntie."
"Where is that black bag—the little
?"

"Right here."
"Well, I wish you'd get out my black
l. I're nearly there."
"But it's so hot and thick, auntie!"
"Pollyanna, I asked for that black
l. You'd please learn to do what ask without arguing about it, it ulde a great deal easier for me.
vanth that veil. Do you suppose I'm ngo give all Beldingsville a chance se how I 'take it'?"

"Oh auntie, they'd never be there
th spirit," protested Pollyanna, ridly rummaging in the black bag
t much-wanted veil. "Besides, re von't be anybody there, anyway, to meet us. We didn't tell any one we were coming, you know."

"Yes, I know. We didn't tell any one to meet us. But we instructed Mrs. Durgin to have the rooms aired and the key under the mat for to-day.
Do you suppose Mary Durgin has kept that information to herself? Not much! Half the town knows we're coming today, and a dozen or more will 'happen around' the station about train time. I know them! They want to see what Polly Harrington poor looks like. They—"

"Oh, auntie, auntie!" begged Pollyanna, with tears in her eyes.

"If I wasn't so alone! If—the doctor were only here, and"—She stopped speaking and turned away her head. Her mouth worked convulsively.
"Where is—that veil?"

"Yes, dear. Here it is—right here," comforted Pollyanna, whose only aim now, plainly, was to get the veil into her aunt's hands with all haste. "And here we are now almost there. Oh, auntie, I do wish you'd had Old Tom or Timothy meet us!"

"And ride home in state, as if we could afford to keep such horses and carriages? And when we know we shall have to sell them tomorrow? No,
I thank you, Pollyanna. I prefer to use the public carriage, under those circumstances."

"I know, but—" The train came to a jolting, jarring stop, and only a fluttering sigh finished Pollyanna's sentence.

As the two women stepped to the platform, Mrs. Chilton, in her black veil, looked neither to the right nor the left. Pollyanna, however, was nodding and smiling tearfully in half a dozen directions before she had taken twice as many steps. Then suddenly she found herself looking into a familiar, yet strangely unfamiliar face.

"Why, it isn't—it is—Jimmy!" she beamed, reaching forth a cordial hand.
"That is, I suppose I should say Mr.
Pendleton," she corrected herself with a shy smile that said plainly,
"Now that you've grown so tall and fine!"

"I'd like to see you try it," challenged the youth, with a very Jimmy-like tilt to his chin. He turned then to speak to Mrs. Chilton; but that lady, with her head half averted, was hurrying on a little in advance.

He turned back to Pollyanna, his eyes troubled and sympathetic.

"If you'd please come this way—both of you," he urged hurriedly.
"Timothy is here with the carriage."

"Oh, how good of him!" cried Pollyanna, but with an anxious glance at the somber veiled figure ahead. Timidly she touched her aunt's arm. "Auntie, dear, Timothy's here. He's come with the carriage. He's over this side. And —this is Jimmy Bean, auntie. You remember Jimmie Bean?"

In her nervousness and embarrassment Pollyanna did not notice that she had given the young man the old name of his boyhood. Mrs. Chilton, however, evidently did notice it. With palpable reluctance she turned and inclined her head ever so slightly.

"Mr.—Pendleton is very kind, I am sure; but I am sorry that he or Timothy took quite so much trouble," she said frigidly.

"No trouble—no trouble at all, I assure you," laughed the young man, trying to hide his embarrassment.
"Now if you'll just let me have your checks, so I can see to your baggage."

"Thank you," began Mrs. Chilton;
"but I am very sure we can"—

But Pollyanna, with a relieved little "thank you!" had already passed over the checks; and dignity demanded that
Mrs. Chilton say no more.

The drive home was a silent one.
Timothy, vaguely hurt at the reception he had met with at the hands of his former mistress, sat up in front stiff and straight, with tense lips. Mrs.
Chilton, after a weary "Well, well, child, just as you please; I suppose we shall have to ride home in it now!"
had subsided into stern gloom. Pollyanna, however, was neither stern, nor tense, nor gloomy. With eager though tearful eyes she greeted each loved landmark as they came to it. Only once did she speak, and that was to say:

"Isn't Jimmy fine? How he has improved! And hasn't he the nicest eyes and smile?"

She waited hopefully, but as there was no reply to this she contented herself with a cheerful "Well, I think he has, anyhow."

Timothy had been both too aggrieved and too afraid to tell Mrs.
Chilton what to expect at home; so the wide-flung doors and flower-adorned rooms, with Nancy courtesy-ing on the porch, were a complete surprise to Mrs. Chilton and Pollyanna.

"Why, Nancy, how perfectly lovely!"
cried Pollyanna, springing lightly to the ground. "Auntie, here's Nancy to welcome us. And only see how charming she's made everything look!"

Pollyanna's voice was determinedly cheerful, though it shook audibly. This homecoming without the dear doctor, whom she had loved so well, was not easy for her; and if hard for her, she knew something of what it must be for her aunt. She knew, too, that the one thing her aunt was dreading was a breakdown before Nancy, than which nothing could be worse in her eyes.
Behind the heavy black veil the eyes were brimming and the lips were trembling, Pollyanna knew. She knew, too, that to hide these facts her aunt would probably seize the first opportunity for fault-finding, and make her anger a cloak to hide the fact that her heart was breaking. Pollyanna was not surprised, therefore, to hear her aunt's few cold words of greeting to Nancy, followed by a sharp "Of course all this was very kind, Nancy;
but, really, I would have much preferred that you had not done it."

All the joy fled from Nancy's face.
She looked hurt and frightened.

"Oh, but, Miss Polly—I mean, Mis' Chilton," she entreated; "it seemed as if I just couldn't let you—"

"There, there, never mind, Nancy," interrupted Mrs. Chilton. "I—I don't want to talk about it." And, with her head proudly high, she swept out of the room. A minute later they heard the door of her bedroom shut upstairs.

Nancy turned in dismay.

Can God Count on Us?

WHEN and how will God visit the world with a gracious and overwhelming blessing? To what extent will the great war hinder the work of his Spirit in the world? What things in the hearts of the men and women of America are keeping God out of our lives and depriving in any degree our nation of his blessing? May we expect a great turning to God, either in Europe or America, during the months just ahead? These are profound questions, profound enough to bow our hearts to the dust.

God is eager to bless our nation and the world. He will do it if channels are provided in human souls through which his power may descend. We can count on that. God is on the side of the people who yearn that the world shall be blessed and saved.

Not even the roar of cannon, the cries of wounded and dying men, the groans of widowed women, nor the moans of starving children can dismay God, nor make him give up hope for the world. He still has his hand upon us. Underneath us yet are the everlasting arms. He will bless us in spite of ourselves.

Here in America, though we have some colossal sins, such as greed and industrial injustice, drunkenness and harmful pleasure-seeking, yet the great fundamental national sins are indifference to God and personal rebellion against his sovereignty. With all that Christ means of humility and self-sacrifice and union with God, we are saying: "We will not have this man to rule over us!"

We have, to a woful extent, lost our faith. "When the Son of man cometh shall he find faith on the earth?" Would he find it tonight in your heart, in your home, in your church? Are you expecting him to bless you? Are you expecting him to use you in blessing others? Are you? According to your faith be it unto you. You have been inefficient because you expected to be inefficient, because you were willing to be inefficient. When you are ready to expect God to make you efficient he will do so.

We must absolutely obey him, so far as he makes his will known. Are you willing? "Are you willing to be made willing, then?" as Dr. Meyer asked Dr. Chapman at Northfield, leading him by that subtle and gentle question to the great surrender which opened his heart for the blessing which has made him a power for God and souls all over the world?

After all, God has answered our question long ago. What keeps out the blessing? Our disobedience. Listen! He is speaking to America now as he spoke to Israel long ago. "Bring ye all the tithes into the storehouse and prove me now herewith if I will not open you the windows and pour you out such a blessing that there shall not be room enough to receive it."

The Naval War Zones

IN THE light of the official interpretation of its new war zone proclamation, which was transmitted by Germany on February 7 in a memorandum to Ambassador Gerard, it is now evident that the temporary scare on the subject, which was started by sensational despatches in the American press, had little or no foundation. In the memorandum of the German Foreign Office it is made clear that Germany has no intention of sinking neutral ships, but simply means to warn them of the dangers within the zone from torpedoes intended for enemy vessels. Yet the original proclamation is sufficiently startling from the very extent of the sea territory it embraces.

Comparison of the two war zone proclamations is instructive. That of England was issued November 4 and became effective next day, November 5. It included the entire North Sea, and consequently the whole of the ocean frontage available to Germany's naval forces. Germany's war zone decree was announced on February 6, to take effect twelve days later, on February 18, and embraces the English Channel and all the territorial and high sea waters around the United Kingdom. Both belligerents warned neutrals of the perils to shipping within the zones, and each indicated a path of safety for neutral commerce. Here, however, there is this marked difference: that while the British "open road" for neutrals is along the channel and the Straits of Dover, the German path of safety for neutrals is the north of Scotland route. Vessels of other powers would thus be in danger by either passage.

With the establishment of these two war zones, the great struggle enters a new phase. In both cases the object is the same: to stop the enemy's food supplies and check imports of every kind that can be made available for continuing the war. Germany frankly admits that the step is taken in retaliation of England's effort "to stop neutral sea commerce with Germany," and charges that Britain's object has been, through the "paralyzation of legitimate neutral commerce, not only to strike at the German military strength, but also at the economic life of Germany, and finally by starvation to doom the entire population of Germany to destruction." England justified her course on the ground that "vital interests" were at stake, and Germany appeals to "vital interests" as her justification also. While there are other details, these are the essential outstanding features.

There have been many opinions expressed as to the probable effect of the new strategy on the world's commerce, on the food supply of the combatant powers, and on the duration of the war itself. It is a war that has already upset all precedents. There is little probability that either Germany or England will be starved out, however energetically the blockades may be enforced, if indeed they can be enforced at all. General Von Falkenhayn, the German chief of staff, has declared that Germany has food enough and can go on fighting indefinitely. Lord Kitchener, on the other hand, is quoted as saying that the real war will not begin until May. It is admitted that the duration of the struggle cannot be controlled or even materially affected by neutrals. Meanwhile our government in Washington is safeguarding American interests, and its task will be made easier if our people show their confidence by avoiding fruitless controversies, and especially by refusing to give heed to sensational rumors, no matter from what source they come.

The Joy of Doing Good

THERE is a virtue in the exercise of simple kindness that sweetens and dignifies life. If we, by any little service cheerfully rendered, can bring sunshine and comfort into less fortunate lives, we are conscious of being the gainers in a degree that makes us debtor to happiness. And if we are moved, not by any spirit of patronage, but by the Christ-love in our own hearts, which prompts us to share our blessings, then we give ourselves with the service.

"Bundle Day" was an illustration of the fulness with which the stream of human kindness flows when the heart opens its reservoirs. What generous thoughts, what gracious impulses must have moved the multitude of men and women who chose from their personal belongings not the worthless cast-offs, but the things that were far from being discarded, in order that their poorer brothers and sisters might be outfitted for once in the garb of respectability! What mountains of suits and dresses, of shirts and skirts, of hosiery and sweaters, warm wraps and winter overcoats! What overflow of baby-clothes, of mitts, of well-nigh irreproachable gloves; what wealth of fleecy blankets and downy quilts, suggestive of bed-time comfort! It was a festival of philanthropy, a veritable shower of good things, to which innumerable homes contributed and in which factories, warehouses, mills, and big business establishments had a generous part. "Bundle Day" has given to multitudes a new zest in well-doing and has taught them the happiness that is to be found in unostentatious kindness, and in the knowledge that they have helped to bring back self-respect and confidence to many who were finding the battle of life all too hard. It is an experiment well worth being repeated.

Christianity and Politics

SOMEBODY has asked the question, which is now being very widely discussed in the newspapers, "Can a politician be a Christian?" If it were true that politics is, according to the formal definition, "the science of government," the question might not be difficult to answer; but unfortunately, politics is not always what the definition represents. Bossism, graft, and temptation in many forms that make principles subservient to interest are among its characteristics. Yet politics, in the best sense, cannot be said to be incompatible with Christianity. There are doubtless many Christian men occupying political posts—men of sterling principle, devoted to the truest and best ideals and who can not be swerved from their conception of what is right. Such men are among the thought and action in every generation, adherence to the teachings of Christ not questioned.

There are many callings of which it can be said that their degradation or elevation depends upon the individual. We have Christian Christian soldiers and Christians in other It was not designed by the Founder of Christianity that his followers should keep themselves those occupations in which they might meet with temptation, but rather that they remain and by resisting temptation act as leaven for the whole. They are to be in yet not worldly; sanctified and kept from of the world, as He was sanctified, that of be led to believe through their example. This is the real test of Christianity: when a carry into his business, whether he be a professional or day laborer, the mode and action that are characteristic of high it is his duty to remain there. Religion raise the standard of a nation or a community is to be exclusive. It is by doing our duty we may happen to be placed, and by still others to do likewise that we can vindicate Christianity does not and should not include any one for any of the real tasks of life. If in business which he regards as being in conflict with Christian principles, then it is his duty as a Christian to get out of it. But the good not an ascetic, to withdraw himself because roundings may not measure up to his standard one who does a man's share of the work of his hands, and who in the doing lifts and all around him. We need Christians in we need them in every other field of endeavor and the more the better.

Something Forgotten

IT IS not often that a man finds his true late in life. With the passage of the mind ceases more or less to accommodate to new conditions and situations. Yet occasional exceptions, as is shown in the old ironmaster, Andrew Carnegie, who, nearing the eighties, took up the task of a theologian and preached what was meant to be a little sermon to the Bible class of his friend Mr. Rockefeller, at a social gathering of in New York a few days ago. He began by telling them that he came of orthodox Presbyterian stock and that his uncle, whom he closely resembled mentally and physically, was a Baptist preacher. It was a fair presumption that the ironmaster had in his make-up some of the Baptist fire and eloquence mingled with and mellowed by the sterner Presbyterianism. The combination seems to have surprising results, theologically speaking, if the published reports of the event be correct. In his own religious attitude, Mr. Carnegie stood about equally for both denominations. He was glad to see all the sects now working for the good of mankind. He himself entertained the most liberal views of God. "You can't level," he said, "that the Eternal Father picks out us who have done wrong and then tortures forever. No, the God above is trying to take care of us all and will do all that he can for the little peccadillos that all of us commit. I wiped out like this," which he illustrated by a sweeping movement across the table with his pinkie. "Don't be alarmed about your sins," he declared. "There's a lot of them that will never be in heaven. And don't be too good—so good it's good for nothing!"

Most people feel kindly toward the genial ironmaster. However much they may be disposed to criticize his wealth and its acquirement, and with him regarding its distribution, they regard him as a useful and entertaining citizen, wise on peace and other matters. But however seriously he may take himself, as rich men often do, he is disposed to accept him at his own valuation as a reliable theologian. In his little talk to the Bible class, he seems to have overlooked the essential factor in man's forgiveness; and to some it may be scolded as though a Presbyterian were preaching Universalism to a gathering of Baptists.

Whether we be rich or poor, learned or simple, famous or unknown beyond the little circle in which we move, may God grant us that faith in him which shall make us hope to see him "face to face," and to know him as our Saviour and Redeemer.

CONDUCTED BY
FERDINAND C. IGLEHART, D.D.

A RESOLUTION was passed by the legislature of Vermont on January 29, commending Mrs. Bettie Van Metre, of Berryville, Va., for her care of Lieutenant Henry E. Bell of Westfield, Vt., after he was wounded in the Civil War. Lieutenant Bedell's leg was mangled by a shell in a battle at Opequon, Va., and was left behind by his regiment. He was picked up unconscious and carried to a Confederate home. Mrs. Van Metre, then a young woman of twenty, at once went over and insisted on nursing the severely and dangerously wounded. When the man recovered so that he could travel, Mrs. Van Metre accompanied the lieutenant on the troop train, and when Washington was reached, the officer told Mr. Secretary of war, how his life had been saved through her devoted care. The secretary immediately ordered the release of Mrs. Van Metre's husband, a Confederate soldier, who, with one of her brothers, had been imprisoned in Delaware. Mr. Van Metre returned with his wife and Lieutenant Bell to the latter's home in Westfield, where they remained until the wounded man and the rescued one had fully regained their health. Mr. and Mrs. Van Metre are still living at Berryville, Va. The resolution says: "It seems most fitting that the State of Vermont should take recognition in recognition of the self-sacrificing devotion of this young girl, a girl of fifty years ago to the Green Mountain boys." "We are their Northern sisters, the women who were heroic in their devotion for the sick and wounded soldiers. Some of the most beautiful romances and life alliances are the results of such sympathy on their part for suffering foes. Above all, in all genuine charity, this beautiful service was done to Him who said of such as I was sick, and ye visited me; I was in prison and ye came to me." (Matt. 25: 36.)

PPYING to the practice of usury the principles of the usury Act, Mr. O'Gorman the day introduced in the United States Senate a bill making it a crime to use the mails for negotiating loans in violation of the laws of any state. Governor Pitman of New York, when the attorney, investigated this and reported that by a system of "sympathetic directors," loan corporations took high interest for nominal services to borrowers who obtained money at the legal rate of interest from one member of the group. Dishonest lenders generally found some way of evading the law against excessive interest, the interest being put into the face of the note or provided for in some other manner. It is to be hoped that Senator O'Gorman's bill will become a law and produce the desired effect. The psalmist, in describing the wickedness of the king of Tyre, says: "He that putteth out his money to usury." (Ps. 15: 5.)

Legislature of New York, with little or no opposition, passed a bill the other day submitting the question of female suffrage to a vote of the electorate of the state. From now till never there will be a most strenuous campaign waged on both sides. Against the measure will be a large number of intelligent, dignified women, who claim that the women themselves do not want the measure; that the best women would not exercise the franchise if granted, and that those who have would be deteriorated in the quality of their manhood. Equal suffrage will also be fought by the opposite extreme of society, the underworld, impelled by the instinctive dread that women would vote out the saloon and other institutions of vice. The measure will be backed up by women of brains, wealth and social culture, with sane arguments, driven home with the warmest enthusiasm. They insist that the marvelous spread of the movement is on its merits, and that in the states that have adopted it, it has not hurt the women and has wrought untold public good. Among most of the nations of the past woman has been counted an inferior, and amongst millions today she is considered little better than man's slave. Among the Hebrews she held an exalted position in the family. Some of the women of the Bible had great ability and exalted virtues, and were entrusted with large responsibility. Among them was Miriam, the poetess, prophetess and patriot, who was looked up to as one of the national leaders. There is this account of her leading the women in a service of praise in recognition of the victory of the children of Israel: "And Miriam answered them, Sing ye to the Lord, for he hath triumphed gloriously; the horse and his rider hath he thrown into the sea." (Ex. 15: 21.)

out upon the streets in the rain and snow for the non-payment of rent that she changed her mind and plans and gave the $500 of shopping money for their aid. This was a beautiful act upon the part of this young woman. Eternity alone will reveal the good she did. Her act is an illustration of the fact that there are persons of wealth and culture who love their fellow men, and who are willing to share their material gifts with the less fortunate and those that suffer. We have here the illustration of a society woman who thinks it is a more important thing to keep poor families off the street in the cold winter time than to have new dresses, and who had the disposition and took the time to look up the families where need was most urgent. She is rich, not because she has a good bank account or a costly wardrobe or an enviable social position, but because she was rich toward God in caring for his poor. She presents an exact contrast to the one Christ condemned so scathingly for getting rich and not aiding others: "So is he that layeth up treasure for himself, and is not rich toward God." (Luke 12: 21.)

THE passage of the Coast-Guard bill by Congress recently was a wise measure. Its chief provision is a pension for the life-saver after thirty years of hard labor in saving property and life. A better opportunity is afforded for the education of the children. The story is told of a life-saver who worked nearly thirty-three years at his occupation; then, being too old and broken for any such service, and not being able to save a great deal on his $65 a month, he was finally compelled to go to the poorhouse. Mrs. Martin W. Littleton and other philanthropists took a deep interest in securing the passage of the bill. Our life-savers are a splendid class of men, every way, in their physical fiber, mental keenness, daring courage, and complete self-sacrifice in danger, which they accept with a relish and not with dread. Pensions for such hardy men, who count their lives so lightly for the public safety, should be counted not only a duty but a pleasure. This department of the government of savers of bodies is a type of the church, which is composed of savers of souls, under the leadership and inspiration of the Saviour of the world. "And thou shalt call his name Jesus: for he shall save his people from their sins." (Matt. 1: 21.)

HENRY EVANS, of Pana, Ill., sent a representative to Taylorville to pay for him three small debts of over thirty-five years' standing, all of which amounted to less than $5. Evans, who is an invalid, desiring to have a clear conscience before going into the other world, sent Isaac Jones with the money to pay the bills so that the books be squared before he died. Future accountability for earthly conduct has dropped out of its proper place in the theology, thought and life of too many people. Death does not end all of existence or of responsibility. We are earnestly exhorted to do our duty in this life and not mind the next. We are to do our duty in this life, but it is a matter of supreme importance to us that we mind the next life too. Evans was right in not wanting to go to his great account in the other world, which is inevitable to all, with the stain of dishonesty on his soul. It was the blazing light of a last great day of settlement that flooded his memory and awakened his conscience. Lincoln gave a copy of the Bible to a little Confederate soldier boy, whom he found on the battlefield, supposedly fatally wounded, when he had recovered and been paroled. The Bible had this on the fly leaf: "Take this Book of God to your mother.—A LINCOLN." Three verses of the Book were marked with ink and Mr. Lincoln's personal card. One of them was: "For God shall bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good, or whether it be evil." (Eccles. 12: 14.)

THE Scharnhorst and the Gneisenau, two German war vessels, were sunk in an engagement off the Falkland Islands with the Invincible and Inflexible and several other vessels of the British fleet. The Invincible steamed to the spot where the Gneisenau went down to pick up the hundred or so survivors. One hundred and eighty of them were saved, but nearly two thousand lost their lives. One of the most shocking features of this greatest war of history has been the brilliant, desperate naval duels, and the appalling loss of life entailed. The sight of the wrecks on the sea and the dead on the land ought to prompt the Christian world to offer the prayer of faith for a speedy and permanent peace. Ships were used as vessels of war in olden times. There is this mention of them: "The king of the north shall come against him like a whirlwind, with chariots, and with horsemen, and with many ships." (Dan. 11: 40.)

THE Liberty Bell, it is said, suffers from a serious disease, and if sent on a trip to the Panama-Pacific Exposition at San Francisco it might receive a fatal shock. This was the burden of a report submitted to the Philadelphia chapter of the Daughters of the American Revolution the other day by the metallurgist of the Franklin Institute. The chemist said the diseased condition of the bell was due to several attempts at casting it, and also to the fact that its composition was changed three times, copper being added first and then a quantity of tin after the original bell was cast. Notwithstanding the protest, it is expected that the city council will order the bell sent to the exposition. The bell stands for liberty for our national life. The stones in Jordan were a memorial of national liberty: "These stones shall be for a memorial unto the children of Israel for ever." (Joshua 4: 7.)

A YOUNG woman of means came from Chicago to New York the other day on a shopping trip. She intended to buy some dresses, hats and other articles. On reaching the city she found so many unemployed and so many poor worthy families set

THE BREAD LINE

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

The country lanes are filled with snow, the stars are shining,
The evergreens are straight and stiff against the evening skies;
And many wander in the night, whose lonely hearts are pining,
For country homes, and country scenes, and tender eyes.

The city streets are filled with slush, the city crowds are thronging,
And some there are with mournful souls, and some are overjoyed,
And some there are without a friend, for warm clothing longing;
The mighty, ragged army of the city's unemployed.

The Bread Line! In the dead of night with fingers aching,
Alone and friendless in a world of sorrow and pain,
They stand and wait for food to eat; but mother's arms are breaking,
And mother-prayers are asking that their boys come home again.

IT IS OBJECTED to the Bread Line that many of the same men appear night after night for a hand-out. The explanation is that the same pangs of hunger assail the man without a home, without a job, without a cent, night after night. The purpose of the Bread Line is to stave off despair for one more twenty-four hours. The purpose of the Bread Line is to fan in the starved breasts of these derelicts that flickering hope for better days which survives so persistently in human hearts. The men who enter the Bread Line carry about with them enough shame and remorse for lost opportunities; why make them hopeless? The men of the Bread Line are already embittered enough against what they call "Fate"; why give them another kick downward? Do you ever stop to consider that the best soil in the world in which to plant seeds of kindness is a heart that has been broken up by adversity? The crumbs of the Bread Line are seeds of kindness; it is God's business to bring them to a harvest. He gives some of us opportunity to cultivate that soil and help along the growth of the seed we plant, because we are able to lure many of these unhappy men within sound of the Gospel, sound of good songs and good words. Nearly 300,000 heartening breakfasts were handed out through the Bowery Mission last year. That was a pretty big acreage of good soil into which to cast seeds of kindness. If those seeds grow, they will bear wonderful fruit to the glory of Jesus Christ! This is a mighty hard winter for men without work. We dare any man who has a five-dollar bill in his pocket which he thinks he needs pretty much, to come around and watch the Bread Line some night. You won't take your "five" away: you will figure up in your mind that it will feed two hundred such men once—and you won't keep your five dollars. Why not take our word for it and send on a dollar, two, five—and let us feed twenty to a hundred men as your guests? One of those men may go out the next day and get a job: a month later he may send to a charity institution for his wife to rejoin him; a year hence he may have savings in a bank and be again a man among men—a Christian among Christians. Don't you believe it? We can prove it to you over and over again. Why not take our word for it? Just pin the bill to a letter and say it is for the Bowery Mission Bread Line, and address it to the Christian Herald, Bible House, New York.

THE WAR IN EUROPE

THEY MAY BRING DOWN A ZEPPELIN

FOR the next two months two rivers, the Oise and the Aisne, will exercise an important influence on the campaign in the West. Normally of modest flow, for the two spring months of the year these become turbulent, yellow rushes, overflowing their banks and sending their waters over the surrounding country. The conditions this year point to floods of more than usual importance, and as a result these rivers will present a barrier of the utmost difficulty for either army to cross, practically compelling an almost complete cessation of operations on the part of the armies affected by their courses.

During the past week very little of moment has occurred on this Western battle line. True, there has been some fighting and the usual artillery duels, but the positions of the respective armies have not changed at any point on the line, even as little as two or three hundred yards. In the latter part of last week Zeebrugge, on the Belgian coast, which place the Germans have made a submarine base, was bombarded by an allied fleet and some damage was inflicted. Constant skirmishing took place all through the week on the extreme West, from the sea to Ypres, and as a result the Allies gained slightly at various scattered points, the best gain being made in the vicinity of Ypres. From this point to Soissons almost absolute quiet prevailed. At and in the immediate vicinity of Soissons there was considerable fighting, culminating in a rather severe artillery attack on the town by the Germans, which did little damage. Then from Soissons to the Ardennes Forest all was again calm, an occasional cannon shot being the only manifestation of activity.

At Bagatelle, in the Argonne, there was fighting during most of the week, and the forces engaged were of some size. This fighting continued for four days, both sides losing very heavily, as far as can be judged neither side made any moment. Even around Verdun there was little activity, and this was also the case around St. Mihiel, the usual storm center. Along the Vosges, the weather was bad and the snow so deep that any sustained effort was absolutely out of the question.

As foreshadowed in her communication to the nations some time ago, Germany has begun to remove foreign consuls from the territory in Belgium which she holds. This movement began during the week in Bruges, the consuls there being ordered to haul down their flags and remove the national arms, which are usually placed on the fronts of buildings occupied by consuls of foreign nations. Some of those in Bruges were forced to obey the order. There is no consul there and hence are not prepared for the moment. This action is obviously the forerunner of like action in other Belgian cities, and very possibly the removal of the foreign consuls is a preliminary step to the annexation of Belgium to Germany, which will also necessitate the removal of the diplomatic representatives accredited to the Belgian Government, who are now in residence at Brussels. If Belgium is annexed and retained at the conclusion of the war, Germany it is to be presumed that the Belgians will have taken refuge in Great Britain, Holland and France will be treated somewhat as were the Boers in 1870, to the extent, at least, of being given reasonable time to dispose of such property as they may have in Belgium, in the event that they elect not to return and become subjects of Germany.

One of the Paris papers, and one which is known to exaggeration, informs that the record for surviving the war belongs to one Rene Lalou, of the Twenty-sixth Light Infantry. On the 28th of last September this soldier was in a trench near Montdidier when toward eight o'clock in the morning a shrapnel shell fell within him and exploded. Picked up unconscious at seven in the evening, he was found to have been wounded 139 times by fragments of the exploding shell, but happily none of these wounds was in itself fatal. For a time his life was in danger from loss of blood and shock, but his good constitution triumphed and at the present time he is on the point of being discharged from the hospital.

Austria published on the 18th of January her one hundredth list of casualties, which reached us only yesterday. Unfortunately we do not know what date it brings the casualties up to. The figures are: Officers: killed, 2,263; wounded, 8,175; missing, 628; men, killed, 40,827; wounded, 116,166 and missing, 9,502.

It has been announced in Parliament that the British army losses on the Western battle line were about 40,000 on February 4. There are about 20,000 British prisoners in Germany, of whom, however, only 500 are sailors and marines, leaving some 17,000 as army prisoners. Deducting these from the gross total we have 86,500, which will divide up into approximately 7,500 killed and 69,000 wounded. The net loss in casualties, that is, those killed or so badly wounded as to be unable to return to the fighting line, will therefore be about 21,000. No figures are given for those who have returned home from sick leave, etc., but it may be doubted whether these are really very numerous proportionately.

From a source of uncertain value the statement is made that Ambassador Curzon has stated in a private letter that the German losses up to January 8 were as follows: Killed, 150,000; wounded, 574,000; missing, 12,000 or a total of 896,000. It is very doubtful if these figures only give them with reserve.

The British Parliament met early in the week, but events of very particular interest took place except at the government asked

HARD WORK KEEPS WAR PRISONERS IN TRIM

Parliament to vote it unlimited credit for war operations, the accounts of the expenditures under which are only to be rendered at the termination of the war, and the announcement was made that the army would be increased to three million men. Recruiting up to the present time has brought in about 1,500,000 and there are now supposed to be about 400,000 British troops on the continent.

SENTINEL OUTPOSTS OF THE SERBIAN ARMY

The Russian Duma also met during the week. Petrograd despatches seem to point to this body's demanding a greater share in the government and some real power, and greater political and religious freedom of the masses. The experiences of the members of the first and second Dumas, as a result of demands along similar lines, would seem to be the reverse of encouraging, though, without doubt, this movement will ultimately be successful.

Late last week the German admiralty issued a proclamation declaring the waters around Great Britain and Ireland, including the whole English Channel, a war zone on and after the 18th of the present month, notice of which has been formally given to our government at Washington. This fixed the date for the beginning of the putting into practice of the plan suggested some time ago by Admiral von Tirpitz for destroying British merchant ships, and consequently hampering and hindering all water communications with the British Isles. The notice contains one very drastic provision, which has never probably been incorporated before in a proclamation of this character: "Every enemy merchant ship found in this war zone will be destroyed, even if it is impossible to avert dangers which threaten the crew and passengers."

The attack foreshadowed is probably by submarines, and the base from which such attack on the English Channel will be made is equally probable at some point on the Belgian coast; Zeebrugge for preference, as this place is best adapted for such a base, having facilities in the canal which runs therefrom inland, for withdrawing the submarines a sufficient distance inland to be out of range of the monitors and other light-draught vessels which the Allies are using for bombarding the coast.

The use of the American flag by the British steamer Lusitania of the Cunard Line, in its voyage across the Irish Sea, has aroused great interest, and although it did not mention this instance specifically, the British foreign office issued a statement dealing with such usage in a general way. It argues that the only effect in the case of a merchantman in flying a neutral flag would be to compel a belligerent ship to investigate the nationality of the vessel and the character of her cargo before capturing her.

From stories told by passengers on the Lusitania, it would appear that the captain of the liner received his instructions to hoist the Stars and Stripes from the British Admiralty. He had been warned previously of the presence in those waters of German submarines.

Both of these events are being made the subjects of diplomatic inquiry by our government.

Germany, in addition to importing farm laborers from neutral countries, intends, it is stated, to place the services of her prisoners of war at the disposal of her agriculturists. As she is said to have something between 600,000 and 700,000 of these, many of whom are skilled in this class of work, such action will have an important influence on the size of this autumn's crop, on which, to a considerable degree, depends Germany's economic condition.

A joint relief action by the German and Austrian Governments and the Rockefeller Foundation will probably ensure that the starving population of the Polish territory now occupied by the German and Austrian troops will have its wants, as far as absolute necessities go, largely relieved.

A preliminary investigation of the conditions in this theater of war, undertaken by the Red Cross and the foundation, disclosed that the situation here was, to say the least, as urgent as the situation in Belgium. Some $815,000 had previously been collected in Germany itself for this purpose, and further funds will be forthcoming from the same source, which will be handed over to the foundation for administration and distribution.

The skirmishes along the Suez Canal, between the British and Turks, mentioned last week, were more important than at first thought; the fight at Tonsos cost the British forces 15 killed and 58 wounded, and while they inflicted much heavier punishment on

A WEEK in the WORLD'S NEWS

FANNY CROSBY JOINS THE CHOIR INVISIBLE. Early in the morning of February 12, the world-loved hymn writer, Fanny Crosby, died at her home in Bridgeport, Conn., having almost reached her ninety-fifth birthday, which would have fallen upon March 24. Miss Crosby had been active until within a few months, when she became increasingly feeble and finally dropped to sleep. A review of the life of this wonderful woman will be given our readers in the next number of the Christian Herald.

THE SENATE ALL AT SEA. Just one subject is occupying the attention of the Senate at present, namely the Administration's Shipping Bill calling for the purchase and operation by the government of all the ships it can get its hands on in order to take care of the country's overseas trade, which is suffering for lack of bottoms because of the war. Filibustering is being resorted to to defeat the measure, which the President is understood to intend shall not be defeated. The question of the status of interned ships of warring nations enters into the tangle. Meanwhile the American flag increases in popularity as a protection to shipping, though the Dacia, loaded with cotton, and now once again on her way after having stopped at Newport, Va., to quell a mutiny among some alarmed sailors, fully expects to be seized by British war vessels. The Wilhelmina, carrying a cargo of foodstuffs for Germany, landed of her own free will at Falmouth, England, February 9, her flag flying, and was promptly seized and held for action by England's prize court.

TO MAKE GEOGRAPHY HARDER TO LEARN. Led by Commander J. Foster Stackhouse, the International Oceanographic Expedition will set sail in the good ship Discovery early this summer for a seven years' cruise of some 250,000 miles—if that much sea can be found outside the war zone—in the expectation of charting thousands of islands hitherto left unmolested by science, and making observations in geology, biology, ethnology and other departments of knowledge.

"BUSINESS IS BUSINESS." The Globe and Commercial Advertiser of New York gives some startling figures showing our financial interest in the war. It states that American manufacturers are fairly overwhelmed with orders, that are far beyond their power to fill. One concern has been compelled to refuse an order for $5,000,000 worth of metallic cartridges for machine guns. A vehicle factory's product is sold for three months to come. An order for $10,000,000 worth of shells is waiting its turn—all too busy to take it up now. Every ammunition factory, harness factory and vehicle factory is running on extra time filling war orders, and yet the demand keeps increasing. Some of the neutral European countries are being drawn upon to help out, but the chief source of supply is the United States, where the market is already clogged with orders. "The duration of the war," a manufacturer's agent is quoted as saying, "is all dependent upon the supplies. No one seems to be thinking of the bill."

TAILORING NEW YORK'S UNEMPLOYED. A commendable and well organized effort was made in New York during the week ending February 13 to clothe a million of the poorest by means of a Bundle Day, commuters and residents for days in advance having donated packages upon which they had been asked to state the nature and size of the garments inside. A "mayor's committee" of leading society women signed the appeals that were sent broadcast. Headquarters were at 208 Fifth Avenue. The long lines of men, women and children that passed along the base of the bundle mountain and gradually demolished it contained hundreds who were famished and despairing. A great many new garments, much good underwear, thousands of shoes, countless hats, made up the mammoth collection. Some heart-breaking cases of poverty came to light in the course of the outfitting, and some blood-boiling cases of plain "graft." The net result and ultimate effect of the movement cannot as yet be known.

A SOUTH SEAS HURRICANE. The Manua Islands in the Samoan group were visited early in February by a terrific hurricane with earthquake and tidal wave accompaniments, entire villages being blotted out and great destruction caused to the cocoa palms, a chief food supply of the islanders. A few natives were killed, and the three thousand inhabitants are said to be destitute. An American gunboat has been despatched with food and clothing for temporary relief, as starvation threatens the islanders. It is said that this is the severest hurricane the South Seas have known, and this is attested by the destruction of even the source of the food supply. It is expected that Congress will make provision for the needs of the islands.

SHE FOUGHT IN THE CIVIL WAR. The Oxford Review-Times of Oxford, N. Y., on January 8 published the obituary of Mrs. Kady C. Brownell, who died on January 4, and states that she was the only woman who served in the ranks during the Civil War, later drawing a pension as a veteran. She was born seventy-two years ago on a battlefield in the first Boer war with Great Britain, and was named after Sir George Kady, chaplain in the English army. The account states that Mrs. Brownell, who was married as a girl, followed her husband into the Union army, wearing a special uniform designed by herself, and was allowed to join his company, with which she served in the first battle of Bull Run, and in other engagements. After the war she was mustered into the Grand Army of the Republic, the only woman receiving that distinction.

ROBBING THE SEA. Several cases have been reported this winter of heroic rescues of the crews of ships wrecked at sea. On February 5 the Steamship Philadelphia, Captain Mills, when in mid-ocean sighted the tank steamer Chester, Captain Steegbarth, in a sinking condition, and put off a lifeboat manned by volunteers in the teeth of a storm, and succeeded in saving the oil ship's captain and crew, many of the men being taken from the water. About the same time the full crew of the steamer Imatasa were rescued in a similar way from their sinking ship by the steamer El Zorro, according to wireless via Halifax, N. S.

INTERSTATE HEROES. Congress some time ago authorized a medal to be given to persons who at the risk of their own lives save another's or prevent accidents upon railroads, or try to do so, and the sixteenth award under this act was to Patrick W. Mulligan of Norristown, Pa., who saved a child from death on the Pennsylvania line last August, President Wilson sending a letter of commendation with the medal early this month.

WITH MEXICO'S PRESIDENTS. General Carranza has been the most prominent of Mexico's four presidents that closes as this issue of the Christian Herald goes to press. Having ordered the departure of the Spanish minister, José Caro, on February 10 within twenty-four midnight, because of alleged activity on behalf of Vill Carranza at once left Mexico City for Vera Cruz, where a Spanish steamer for Havana, declining an asylum in the United States battleship Delaware, which is not in Carranza's hands, is said that the other diplomats in Mexico are indignant over the incident. President Villa has Carranza officials in the southern district of Lower who were elected at the last election. The bodies of a brother and a nephew of General Carranza, who as hosta Villa were executed at the latter's order, reached Vera Cruz on February 12, and lay in state. Presidents Zapata and were not heard from. Although there is something about the unending commotion in Mexico, it may be that the revolutionary movements in that country with considerable bloodshed and widespread suffering present condition of Mexico does not appear to be pitious.

A HUMANE LEGISLATURE. The Iowa Senate on February 1 passed a bill providing free medical treatment by the state for deformed and diseased children of the poor, which maladies can be cured; the preliminary examination and traveling expenses to the hospitals are to be borne by the state. The judge of the juvenile court will determine the cases for state care.

NEW YORK CITY'S BUDGET for the coming year will aggregate $200,000,000. Nineteen years ago the cost of the entire city government was in the neighborhood of $51,000,000 a year. Municipal expenditures have increased. A proposition has been made to tax an excess of $2,000, but Mayor Mitchell is authority for the statement that it will not be seriously considered.

ALL-STATES FOOD CARGO TO BELGIUM. Carrying foodstuffs valued at over $530,000, the gift of more than 1,500 persons representing every state in the Union, the Great City sailed from New York for Rotterdam, February 12, the cargo included 140,000 pounds of condensed milk for the 30,000 Belgian babies born since the war began. The total value of supplies which have now been sent from America to Belgium alone reaches into the millions. It is estimated that Belgium's "Bread Line" is 2,500 miles long.

TOWARD WORLD FEDERATION. Senator Follette's resolution for an international conference is the latest legislative measure to meet the war situation in Europe. It provides for our government taking the initial step by extending an invitation for such a conference, the object being (1) an offer of mediation, (2) the adoption of rules for limitation of armaments, (3) prohibition of war exports by neutrals, (4) neutral federation to provide for neutrality of ocean trade routes, (5) a general agreement as to the rights of neutral commerce. This is the third piece of legislation introduced in the present Congress.

JAPAN SEEMS SMITTEN WITH CHINA. Japan is proving an ardent suitor for China, favors, if reports can be credited. Kiau-tsun seems to have whetted the island empire's fancy for dominance in Chinese affairs. Although the original demands for extraordinary concession require China to maintain secrecy during the negotiations, it is now stated "on high official authority" that the stipulations that China should cede a section of her coast or islands to any power. Japan, employment of Japanese in high positions in the army, police and financial departments, purchase of at least half of China's arms and ammunition from Japan, dependence upon Japan alone for foreign aid in preserving China's integrity, and similar tokens of high preferment. China is temporizing in the new emergency, and Japan is said to be meditating a surprise force. Dr. Sun Yat Sen, of revolutionary and rebel fame, has been pardoned offenses against the present government and offered a high position if he and fellow "rebels" declare their loyalty.

MEN OF NOTE PASS ON. John Jasper, who has been twenty-three years superintendent of New York City schools, retiring in 1905 with the high esteem of his associates, because of the things he had accomplished, died at Washington, February 7 aged 78. On February 8 James C. Fargo, one of the country's foremost express officials, died at New York aged 94. James Creelman, a famous journalist, died in Berlin, February 12, at the age of 55.

FRANCE TO SIGN THE PLEDGE. The first step toward national prohibition of alcoholic drink in France is being taken by the Chamber of Deputies, which on February 12 adopted a bill prohibiting the sale of absinthe, although the colonies being included, the measure then goes to the Senate. In the course of the debate it was promised that the suppression of absinthe was only the beginning.

PORTUGAL TO THE FRONT. The Portuguese foreign minister has stated to the press that the government is resolved to carry out the agreement of Congress made in August and affirmed in November to enter the war as an ally of Great Britain. It is stated that Portuguese troops have for some time been engaged in western Africa. The entire mobilization strength of Portugal is put at about 250,000; the navy includes five cruisers and a few torpedo boats.

THE "ERIN" FOR RED CROSS

THOMAS LIPTON, in writing to friend, gives the following account of the Red Cross work in which the steam yacht Erin is now engaged: I am expecting to leave here at the end of the 20th of this month, in connection with the trip the Erin is making under the British Red Cross flag. The Erin will leave next week and will go direct to Marseilles, where the personnel will join her. Besides a large party of doctors, nurses and clerics, she will carry from 25 to 30 tons of medical stores and a large quantity of hospital comforts and also clothing for the soldiers of Montenegro and Serbia. From Marseilles she will proceed to Antivari in Montenegro with doctors and nurses. Then, afterwards coming down the Albanian coast, through the Corinth Canal, to Piræus and from thence to Salonica, where a special train will convey the rest of the doctors, nurses and stores to Nish and Belgrade in Serbia. I will accompany the party and will see that everything is carried out in the best way possible. The expedition will be in charge of Captain Bennett, of the British Red Cross Society.

"There are a good many mines floating about the Adriatic, but I understand they will all be cleared away before the Erin arrives.

"The Servians and Montenegrins have done very well, and I feel it a great pleasure that I am able to do my little bit to help my country at this time. Yours faithfully,

(Signed) "THOMAS J. LIPTON."

THE RETURN OF POLLYANNA

"O Miss Pollyanna, what is it? I have done? I thought she'd said I meant it all right!"
"Of course you did," wept Pollyanna, fumbling in her bag for her handkerchief. "And 'twas lovely to see you do it, too—just lovely." But she didn't like it."
Yes, she did. But she didn't want to see she liked it. She was afraid to show—other things, and—Oh, no, Nancy, I'm so glad just to see you. And Pollyanna was sobbing on Nancy's shoulder.
"There, there, dear; so she shall, so shall," soothed Nancy, patting the girl's shoulders with one hand, and with the other, to make the need of her apron serve as a handkerchief to wipe her own tears away. "Yes, see, I mustn't—cry—before—," altered Pollyanna; "and it was coming here—the first time, I know, and all. And I knew how it was feeling."
"Of course, of course, poor lamb," said Nancy. "And to think the thing I should have done was never to vex her, and—"
"O, but she wasn't vexed at that," cried Pollyanna, agitatedly. "It's the other way, Nancy. You see she isn't like to show how badly she is about—about the doctor. And she's afraid she will show it that she just takes anything for an excuse—talk about. She does it to me, just the same. So I know all about it. See?"
"O yes, I see, I do, I do." Nancy's face softened a little severely, and her sympathetic pats, for the moment, were even more loving, if possible. "Poor lamb! I'm glad I come, yes, for your sake."
"Yes, so am I," breathed Pollyanna, still drawing herself away and wiping her eyes. "There, I feel better. I do thank you ever so much, and I appreciate it. Now don't keep you when it's time for you to go."
"H. I'm thinkin' I'll stay for a while," sniffed Nancy.

"Stay! Why, Nancy, I thought you were married. Aren't you Timothy's wife?"

"Sure! But he won't mind—for you. He'd want me to stay—for you."

"Oh, but, Nancy, we couldn't let you," demurred Pollyanna. "We can't have anybody—you know, now. I'm going to do the work. Until we know just how things are, we shall live very economically, Aunt Polly says."

"Ho! as if I'd take money from—" began Nancy, in bridling wrath; but at the expression on the other's face she stopped and let her words dwindle off into a mumbling protest, as she hurried from the room to look after her creamed chicken on the stove.

Not until supper was over and everything put in order did Mrs. Timothy Durgin consent to drive away with her husband; then she went with evident reluctance, and with many pleadings to be allowed to come "just to help out a bit" at any time.

After Nancy had gone Pollyanna came into the living room where Mrs. Chilton was sitting alone, her hand over her eyes.

"Well, dearie, shall I light up?" suggested Pollyanna, brightly.

"Oh, I suppose so."
"Wasn't Nancy a dear to fix us all up so nice?"

No answer.
"Where in the world she found all these flowers I can't imagine. She has them in every room down here, and in both bedrooms, too."

Still no answer.
Pollyanna gave a half-stifled sigh and threw a wistful glance into her aunt's averted face. After a moment she began again hopefully.

"I saw Old Tom in the garden. Poor man, his rheumatism is worse than ever. He was bent nearly double. He inquired very particularly for you, and—"

Mrs. Chilton turned with a sharp interruption.

"Pollyanna, what are we going to do?"

"Do? Why, the best we can, of course, dearie."

10% More for Your Money

Quaker Oats is put up also in a 25-cent size, nearly three times as large as the 10-cent size. By saving in packing it offers you 10 per cent more for your money. See how long it lasts.

Nature's Pet

On Quaker Oats She Lavishes Her Best

The oat is Nature's favorite grain. Through sun and soil she lavishes her richest treasures on it.

She stores it with phosphorus and lecithin, of which brains and nerves are made. She endows it with matchless vim-producing powers. Then, to win the children to the food they need, she adds enticing flavor and aroma.

But not to all oats. Some grains are starved and puny. Only the big, plump grains show Nature's lavishness. So we use in Quaker Oats those premier grains alone. Thus you get in these flakes the essence of the oat—the utmost that this food affords.

Quaker Oats

Luscious, Fragrant Flakes of Vim

A bushel of choice oats yields but ten pounds of oats we think fit for Quaker. These choice, rich grains are treated by heat in a way which enhances their flavor. Then we roll them into big, inviting flakes.

That is why Quaker Oats, nearly all the world over, holds the first place among oat foods. Even Great Britain, the home of the Scotch oats, sends for millions of pounds of Quaker.

Serve it in abundance. Each spoonful is a battery of energy, yet young folks rarely get enough. A food so rich in what children need should be served in big dishes and often.

There lies the reason for Quaker Oats—delicate, fragrant, delicious. It makes this the wanted food, and every mother desires that.

In Quaker Oats you get this extra quality without any extra price. You will get it if you and anywhere if you specify Quaker Oats.

Quaker Cooker

We have made to our order— from pure Aluminum—a perfect Double Boiler. It is extra large and heavy. We supply it to users of Quaker Oats, for cooking these flakes in the ideal way. It insures the fullness of food value and flavor. See our offer in each package.

Mrs. Chilton gave an impatient gesture.

"Come, come, Pollyanna, do be serious for once. You'll find it is serious, fast enough. What are we going to do? As you know, my income has almost entirely stopped. Of course some of the things are worth something, I suppose; but Mr. Hart says very few of them will pay anything at present. We have something in the bank, and a little coming in, of course. And we have this house. But of what earthly use is the house? We can't eat it, or wear it. It's too big for us, the way we shall have to live; and we couldn't sell it for half what it's really worth unless we happened to find the person that really wanted it."

"Sell it! Oh, auntie, you wouldn't—this beautiful house, full of lovely things!"

"I may have to, Pollyanna. We have to eat—unfortunately."

"I know it; and I'm always so hungry," mourned Pollyanna, with a rueful laugh. "Still, I suppose I ought to be glad my appetite is so good."

"Very likely. You'd find something to be glad about, of course. But what shall we do, child? I do wish you'd be serious for a minute."

A quick change came to Pollyanna's face.

"I am serious, Aunt Polly. I've been thinking. I—I wish I could earn some money."

"Oh, child, child, to think of my ever living to hear you say that!" moaned the woman; "a daughter of the Harringtons having to earn her bread!"

"Oh, but that isn't the way to look at it," laughed Pollyanna. "You ought to be glad if a daughter of the Harrington's is smart enough to earn her bread! That isn't any disgrace, Aunt Polly."

"Perhaps not; but it isn't very pleasant to one's pride, after the position we've always held in Beldingsville, Pollyanna."

Pollyanna did not seem to have heard. Her eyes were musingly fixed on space.

"If I only had some talent! If only I could do something better than anybody else in the world," she sighed at last. "I can sing a little, play a little, embroider a little, and darn a little; but I can't do any one of them well—not well enough to be paid for it."

"I think I'd like best to cook," she resumed, after a minute's silence, "and keep house. You know I loved that in Germany winters, when Gretchen used to bother us so much by not coming when we wanted her. But I don't exactly want to go into other people's kitchens to do it."

"As if I'd let you! Pollyanna!" shuddered Mrs. Chilton again.

"And of course, to just work in our own kitchen here doesn't bring in anything," bemoaned Pollyanna; "not any money, I mean. And it's money we need."

"It most emphatically is," sighed Aunt Polly.

There was a long silence, broken at last by Pollyanna.

"To think that after all you've done for me, auntie—to think that now, if I only could, I'd have such a splendid chance to help! And yet—I can't do it. Oh, why wasn't I born with something that's worth money?"

"There, there, child, don't, don't! Of course, if the doctor—" The words choked into silence.

Pollyanna looked up quickly and sprang to her feet.

"Dear, dear, this will never do!" she exclaimed, with a complete change of manner. "Don't you fret, auntie. What'll you wager that I don't develop the most marvelous talent going, one of these days? Besides, I think it's real exciting—all this. There's so much uncertainty in it. There's a lot of fun in wanting things—and then watching for them to come. Just living along and knowing you're going to have everything you want is so—so humdrum, you know," she finished with a gay little laugh.

Mrs. Chilton, however, did not laugh. She only sighed and said:

"Dear, me, Pollyanna, what a child you are!"

CHAPTER XVIII

TWO LETTERS

IT WAS toward the latter part of June that the letter came to Pollyanna from Della Wetherby.

I am writing to ask you a favor. I am hoping you can tell me of some quiet private family in Beldingsville that will be willing to take my sister to board for the summer. There would be three of them, Mrs. Carew, her secretary, and her adopted son, Jamie. (You remember Jamie, don't you?) They don't like to go to an ordinary hotel or boarding house. My sister is very tired, and the doctor has advised her to go into the country for a complete rest and change. He suggested Vermont or New Hampshire. We immediately thought of Beldingsville and you; and we wondered if you couldn't recommend just the right place to us. I told Ruth I would write you. They would like to go right away, early in July, if possible. Would it be asking too much to request you to let us know as soon as you conveniently can if you do know of a place? Please address me here. My sister is with us here at the Sanatorium for a few weeks' treatment.

Hoping for a favorable reply, I am,

Most cordially yours,

DELLA WETHERBY.

For the first few minutes after the letter was finished Pollyanna sat with frowning brow, mentally searching the homes of Beldingsville for a possible boarding house for her old friends. Then a sudden something gave her thoughts a new turn, and with a joyous exclamation she hurried to her aunt in the living-room.

"Auntie, auntie," she panted, "I've got just the loveliest idea. I told you something would happen, and that I'd develop that wonderful talent some time. Well, I have. I have right now. Listen! I've had a letter from Miss Wetherby, Mrs. Carew's sister—and they want to come into the country to board for the summer, and Miss Wetherby's written to see if I didn't know of some place for them. They don't want a hotel or an ordinary boarding-house, you see. And at first I didn't know of one; but now I do. I do, Aunt Polly! Just guess where 'tis."

AMONG THE WORKERS

THE Bethesda Leper Home, Surinam, Dutch Guiana, needs bandages (old linen, cotton, cheese-cloth, old sheets, etc. No colored material. For the information of people who are willing to send rolls of bandages, instead of bandage material, such rolls must be not larger than two or three inches in diameter, while the bandages must be from two to three inches wide. Always give the name and address of the sender on the package, otherwise acknowledgment of receipt is impossible. As such packages of bandage material must be kept clean and as the voyage to the Leper Home is a long one, donations should be properly packed; if a small package, in strong paper; and if it is a large quantity, in a box (crackerbox, etc.). If sent prepaid by express company packages reach the office without further charge, while a charge is made for the delivery of packages from the piers to the office, if sent by railroad or steamship company. Address R. Dan Wolterbeek, 53 Park Row, New York City.

—ON THE 16TH OF LAST NOVEMBER Mr. and Mrs. E. Cook of Milaca, Minn., celebrated their golden wedding anniversary, their many friends rejoicing with them. They have been members of the Methodist Church for over fifty years and subscribers to the Christian Herald for nearly thirty years. They were, of course, the recipients of many attentions on their beautiful anniversary.

—EVANGELIST W. H. JORDAN of Cedar Rapids, Iowa, has associated with himself for general evangelistic work, Mr. J. W. Paterson of the same city, and this team of workers will be known as Jordan & Paterson.

—THE WILLIAMSBURG RESCUE MISSION of 376 Bedford Avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y., had as its guests, on January 21, the members of the International Union of Gospel Missions, which is composed of superintendents and their co-workers of New York City and vicinity. This mission was born in the hearts of men in the St. John's M. E. Church of Brooklyn on Washington's birthday, 1911. It opened its doors to the public two months later on April 20. There has been a service held every day since. The mission conducts a children's work and Sunday school along with the work of rescue, and the need of the neighborhood is beyond expression.

Note How Goodyear Grows As the Years Roll By

1,479,883 Tires Last Year

In the last fiscal year we sold 1,479,883 Goodyear pneumatic automobile tires. That's about one tire for every car in use. It was 14 times as many as we made in 1909. It is more than were sold of any other tire that's built.

We sold those tires to men like you—to men who seek quality tires. To men who want safety, strength and endurance. Those sales, after 15 years of comparisons, show that Motordom's final verdict is that Goodyear tires are best.

Fortified Tires

The reason lies in Good ear Fortified Tires—tires which protect you in five exclusive ways.

One combats rim-cutting.

One insures safety. Six flat bars of 126 braided wires insure that it can't fly off.

One saves needless blow-outs our "On-Air" cure, which costs $1500 daily.

One reduces by 60 per cent risk of tread separation.

And one combats punctures and skidding. That's our All-Weather tread—tough, double-thick, sharp edged and resistless.

Goodyear Fortified Tires prove you in these five exclusive ways. No other tire offers one of the. We say that you cannot be fair yourself without proving out the tires. Any dealer will supply you.

ONCE upon a time there lived a man—and not so long ago—who did as his father and grandfather had done before him: in love, took unto himself a wife and built for her a house. And he called it the House of Dreams, for the young bride was to realize here all the dreams of her girlhood ideals. Included in the house plans was a new "housework" girl; one of the dependable kind who used to be found in real life and still exist in the minds of engaged couples and their descendants. But after five hired girls, as many nationalities, had come and gone in less than six months, the little bride's pet theory on how to run a household, and keep, a good servant betwixt and away. During that first married life she had ample opportunity to learn the truth about housekeeping; and the truth was that all her approved theories on house management it left her little of anything else. Still she held to the belief that good housekeeping did not mean household drudgery; and she discovered that the best of methods and means could never succeed in giving the right things to a woman. There was the root of all her troubles! Not only the plan of her house, but all of her tools of housework were designed with the spirit to perpetuate the old, discredited adage that "woman's work is never done."

Her new home was re-christened the House of a Hundred Mistakes, and she set about to make it over the way it should have been made in the first place. With a very limited means she took three years to accomplish her plans, but today that house without any servant, save the woman and hired man as occasional repairs, and the mistress of it is a woman who finds time to be a companion to her husband, and a mother who is able to care for the physical needs of her small children, but who devotes more time than most mothers can to her education. Thus ends a true story. The moral follows:

The fact is that we have outgrown, though many of us are still obliged to live, the kind of house that Jack and Jill rebelled. Today the house of Jill is heard throughout the land protesting that while woman's work is, as it always has been and will be, in the home, it need not be a slave to woman must be a slave to her work. Of course from the start the other objected to her daughter's "sw-fangled" ideas, but then the next generation of her day decided to leave the spinning and dyeing of the cloth and the weaving of the cloth done by machinery rather than by hand. And think of the thousands of dear, old ladies who honestly feared for all the time of domesticity when the sewing-machine was introduced as a necessary part of every well-run home!

Unfettered economy is the only sane use for the woman who puts the time of herself into sweeping and patching these days. And even then sometimes have queer ideas on how to run a household. Hundreds of women of limited strength are still struggling with the settles and ash-pans because they can not afford a gas range or stove when, as a matter of fact, they can no more afford the physical effort required by the old-fashioned way than they could eggs at seventy cents a dozen. They simply take pride out of themselves instead of in their pocketbooks. And when I remember the small cost of an oil stove large enough to cook a square meal for a family, and that usually the cost of cooking by gas costs less in the drudgery of cooking with coal, these economies seem all the more range! For two hours on a Sunday the old kitchen fire must be "ket up" to roast a piece of beef; with the help of a simple, inexpensive fireless cooker, that same roast need be only started over a flame, then popped into "the magic cooker," together with vegetables and dessert, right after breakfast or lunch, and the housewife is free to leave her meal to "cook itself."

How long must patient, uncomplaining women read of, hear about and even see demonstrated the advantages of improved kitchen devices, yet continue to waste their time on old methods and their strength on heavy pots and pans? Sometimes is it the husband's fault because he does not know, or does not stop to think? In his own office a man must have the latest filing system or adding machine, knowing it is sure to pay for its cost, and on the farm in even remote districts we see the newest type of sulky plow, or corn-shredder, or hay-press. Then why should the wives of these men be expected to "get along with" the equipment of their grandmothers? Forty-five per cent. of some 3,466 farmers whose methods of operation were recently examined had "invested in" modern farm implements, yet barely a quarter of them had bought a washing machine, or a fireless cooker, or other labor-saving devices for the woman who labored inside the home. No wonder that an authority on home economics was led to remark: "For years men have been discussing the conservation of everything under the sun except—women."

A FRIEND of mine who for no particular reason had lost her good spirits, then her appetite and finally her good looks and usual good health, consulted the family physician; but it was left for me to prescribe the remedy that cured. I chanced one day into her kitchen; drab-colored walls, dingy woodwork, old-fashioned cooking paraphernalia; everything neat, orderly and hopelessly unattractive! It was evident that she needed fresh paint more than a doctor's tonic. Finally I convinced her. The woodwork of that entire room we painted a creamy gray, the walls an even lighter shade and the ceiling white. Pretty linoleum, or to be exact a similar fabric, was laid on the floor, dainty muslin curtains were hung at the windows and three ugly oak chairs were scraped and painted white. A row of bright aluminum things were hung on a rack in plain sight near the new gas range. To be sure it has meant a little more work to keep this light, bright kitchen spick and span, but that extra labor has been more than offset by the time and energy saved by more efficient utensils to work with, and the woman is so happy in her new environment she has forgotten how to be morbid. Indeed, so effective has proved my remedy that reforms have since been carried into the dining-room, where dark and forlorn woodwork was restained and varnished a cheerful color, and wall paper chosen two years ago because it "wouldn't show finger marks" has been replaced by one of the modern light wall coverings from which finger marks, and other marks, may be easily wiped off. The effect is as if another window had been added to the room.

In this twentieth century, then, is it not as inexcusable for a devoted woman to allow needless housework to sap her strength, dampen her enthusiasm for life, consume all of her time and prevent her from entering into the larger joys of home-making, as for the other type of woman to shirk her housekeeping duties for love of ease?

CAMPBELL'S VARNISH STAIN

MADE OF TOUGH FLOOR VARNISH.

Stains and varnishes with one sweep of the brush.

A few scars on floor, furniture or woodwork may take away half your pleasure in a room.

You yourself can fix up that little job in any wood color, or natural, whether it be floor, table, refrigerator, chair, etc., by using a little leisure time and a can of CAMPBELL'S VARNISH STAIN. CAMPBELL'S was the original varnish stain, introduced in 1886. It cuts the cost of labor in half, since it stains and varnishes "with one sweep of the brush."

It flows easily, eliminating all marks and spots, and never shows laps or brush marks. You need only a dry mop to remove the dust from its wonderful finish, as shiny and transparent as glass. CAMPBELL'S VARNISH STAIN is not only beautiful,—it is waterproof and you will be surprised to see how much hard usage it will stand without showing wear. It can be used on either old or new woodwork and over painted, varnished, or shellacked surfaces.

SAUL ANOINTED KING

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR MARCH 1.
I SAM. 8-10. (For class study 9:17 to 10:1)

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By Rev. F. B. Meyer, D.D.

"Fear God. Honor the king." I Peter 2:17.

For some nations, the collective force and majesty of the people is represented by a family, whose eldest son succeeds to the throne; in others the nation finds expression in its elected representative or president. Here it is an empire, and there a commonwealth. But in either case, it is not the man, but the nation for whom he stands, that is the supreme source of authority. In honoring the appointed ruler, we in fact honor the nation. The soul that is devoid of such reverence and respect is a mean and contemptible one, and does not properly estimate the battles and victories, the efforts which have been successful and the failures which have hardly been less so, the triumphs of peace, the trophies of industry. Honor, reverence, respect come with culture; knowledge of history, patriotism, and above all religion. It is God who has implanted in our breasts these noble emotions. It is he who has made nations great, and implanted in human breasts respect for order and authority! Respect and reverence towards him will inevitably lead us to loyalty to our fatherland and flag. Nothing so closely cements a nation as the fear of God. Love God first, and next your home and fatherland, and count it an honor to be called upon to sacrifice your life for either.

A Vestibule Prayer Answered

By Amos R. Wells

IT IS passing strange that Samuel, after witnessing Eli's failure with his sons, should have made the same sad failure himself. We wonder whether both Samuel and Eli were so busy in nation-wide affairs that they had no time—or thought they had none—to train their sons to succeed them. I have just read about a "father and son movement" in Cleveland, the object of which is to make fathers better acquainted with their sons. First, they are to have a banquet together! Both Samuel and Eli should have joined such a "movement."

No wonder, with the prospect of Samuel's sons before them, that the Israelites asked for a king; yet we republicans read with gleeful appreciation Samuel's graphic picture of the average king of the period, and what the Israelites might expect to suffer from such a ruler. I have been reading The New Book of Kings, in which J. Morrison Davidson sets forth mercilessly the many iniquities of Europe's royalties. For example, at the very grave of William the Conqueror a man stood forth, Osceola Fitz-Arthur, and justly claimed the ground as the site of his father's house, wrested from him by William; and the funeral ceremonies did not proceed till the assembled prelates had guaranteed compensation.

Kings being so perilous, why did God grant the people's prayer? There are two kinds of prayers, and God answers both. "Is it not true," asks Dr. John Balcom Shaw, "that into the lives of many of us Christ has never come further than the vestibule? We never have let him into those inner chambers where is the secretmost part of life. There is the council-room in which our plans are gone over, and our judgments formed, and our purposes outlined and set." So there are vestibule prayers and there are council-chamber prayers. This was a vestibule prayer, and God answered it.

Our first acquaintance with Saul, the destined king, does not bear out Samuel's prophecies of evil. He is a fine, manly fellow, sufficiently trusted to be sent for his father's stray asses. It was a small thing, comparatively, finding the wandering animals, but it led to finding a kingdom. A farmer once gave his twelve-year-old boy a small potato, laughingly promising him all the potatoes he could raise from it till he was of age. The boy cut up the potato into as many parts as it had eyes, and planted them. He continued the process till his fourth year's harvest was more than a hundred bushels, and the farmer asked to be released from his bargain. If Saul had only followed along the line of fidelity to little things, he would not have failed in his great thing.

To be sure, Samuel told Saul not to "set his mind" on the asses; but he meant that he should not worry about them. Samuel also wished to arouse Saul's ambition. Dr. J. Ross Stevenson says that "the first and foremost question that can be addressed to any of us, and the most searching one, is 'What do you like?'" Too many of us keep our mind on asses when we should be thinking about our kingdoms.

We like Saul's humility, his thinking that the crown was not for such as he. Once a land-owner in India asked an irrigation engineer if a certain piece of farm land could ever be made profitable. "Yes," answered the engineer, "I can make it bear enormous crops, provided it lies low enough." The territory of Saul's soul did bear noble crops while it lay low down, before the terrible earthquake of pride and self-confidence lifted it too high for the fertilizing streams of God's grace.

That anointing of Saul to be king is a symbol for us. Every one of us has his kingdom, and we have only to ask for it. Once in Scotland a traveler found his way barred by a gate, suddenly shut in his face by a little girl. But the girl said, "You can pass without paying. Just say, 'Please let me go through.'" The traveler spoke the words, and at once the gate was opened, for the owner merely wished to maintain his legal right to his property. It is so with all of the spiritual kingdoms: we have only to ask God for entrance, and the way is open before us.

The proof that Saul really entered his kingdom is this that is said, "God gave him another heart." That was the real anointing; the oil was only a symbol. "If we would know the power of Christ's life," said J. Stuart Holden, "Christ must know the power of our complete surrender to him." This is the new heart which Saul had, and which we also may have on the same terms.

Choosing a King

By Arthur H. Howland

EMERSON writes: "God said, 'I am tired of kings!'" There is a peculiar significance and interest in the study of this lesson at this particular time when the world is having such a sad spectacle of kingdoms clashing, men bleeding, women wailing over the question, "Who shall rule?" The cover design of a great American weekly showed the New Year sweeping the crowns, not the kings, off the earth. Centuries ago God rebuked his people vehemently for insisting upon having a king.

The rise and fall of republics form one of the most interesting phases of history. Rome had a republic, which gave way before the imperialistic idea and fell to ruin; the Dutch republic rose, then fell to make way for a monarchy; France toyed with the republican idea from 1789 to 1871, but has been steady since then; Switzerland has showed a good, steady republican government; China has been the last to come in; while Uncle Sam for a long one hundred and thirty-eight and a half years has kept a successful republican form of government in operation.

But the amount of real democracy country is not always determined by the title of its ruler. The state is sometimes made that England is not of a republic than the United States, despite its throne and crown; a recent writer declared that may, too, is more nearly a relic than the United States, the one having a more complete control of the government and the Kaiser having less actual authority than the President of the United States. We are to study today the overthrow which is probably the earliest relic. The period of the Judges was really a period of democracy, and we was the last president. He had a wonderful career and rendered a nation incalculable service. He organized and solidified the nation, awakened true religious ardor, led the worship of the nation, and made in his schools of the prophets the beginnings of a system of popular education. Samuel was so close to God that the people following him were following him. God was indeed their King, their deity, their Teacher. So he said to Samuel: "They have not rejected me, but me."

The Samuel and Emerson and the other cartoonist all mean by their reason of opposition to kings is that a king may be a despot. The idea of giving to one man power to direct, indeed, the destiny of others is an aim at once to the mind of God and the highest instincts of man. Man in his primitive state likes to be dominated; he likes the thought of a king; he likes a crown; a crown dazzles him. But the new idea, getting back to the old ideas of God, is that every man may be a king—a king ruling well in spirit, managing skilfully the affairs of his own work, acting to the true nobility and true loyalty serving others.

The young people of our Sunday school will see great changes among the nations of the world during their time. Learn early the God-inspired truth of liberty, of the kingly possibility of every soul, of the power of the people to govern themselves. Learn that God is willing to guide any man who will serve him. Learn that the highest ideal for every nation is to have one great king but to raise a generation every man of whom every man may be a king. Learn that the ideal for every life is not to wear a crown, but to help make all men able not to bow down in abject slavishness to one man who wears a crown, but to serve all men—leading them forward to true liberty of soul and to a true vision of God.

The idea of choosing God as King has been made more simple since the coming of Jesus. He is to be King of every life; he is King of kings and Lord of lords. He is King, with absolute power and with absolute right to our obedience, yet he chooses to be not only King, but friend, brother, comrade. And he waits to lead the world into his kingdom of peace and gladness and brotherhood. "Make Jesus King" is the title of a favorite Gospel song. The watchword of the great Sunday school convention at Chicago last summer was, "Jesus shall reign!" Have you made him King of your life?

Echoes from the Holy Land

By Rev. Franklin E. Hoskins, D.D.
Member of Syria Mission

JUDGE, prophet, seer, king, these all are functions of a leader. The prophet in Samuel suggests a man of vision. And the "seer" is one whose vision pierces the veil which hides divine influences in human affairs or one for whom the veil is now and then lifted by some chain of divine providence. Priest and prophet are like the opposite sides of a coin. The priest faces Godward, bearing the prayers and offerings of the people into his presence while the prophet represents God to the people, delivering his word and message to them. Saul the Benjamite was Samuel's choice. In stature, intellectual gifts and opportunity Saul promised well but failed miserably as the years passed.

The qualities which make an ideal king are the same as those which make an ideal man; one in whose heart is written the law of God and who never swerves from the paths of justice, mercy and love. The world has need of fewer kings, but an increasing number of men of kingly character.

High Place. Almost every hilltop in Palestine is now or has been a shrine or place of worship. Once occupied they are rarely deserted. The shrine may pass from Jewish to Christian or Moslem possessors. It may change its name or traditions but it rarely loses its sacred character. It frequently becomes a place of retirement and privacy. Ramah, where Samuel dwelt, became a shrine.

Guest Chamber. One such room is always found in Oriental houses. In large dwellings a number of rooms with separate stairs exists frequently on the upper or highest floor. "Samuel communed with Saul on the housetop. In crowded cities the most retired spots and most frequently used in early morning or after the heat of the day are the housetops.

Kissing and anointing with oil have been referred to in previous lessons. The anointing in this case was for service.

THE WAR AND PALESTINE

The following interesting letter comes from a missionary stationed in Beirut, Syria:

Last week has passed, and the stress and strain of a state of war increases. The Pope and our Powers succeeded in getting permission for the departure of all French missionaries and religious workers; so they departed from the number of more than two hundred. It was urged was: "Seeing that they have been expelled, permit them to leave the country and force them to live on the streets." We have not yet succeeded in securing the same permission for the British missionaries. The government has proceeded to empty the French school and university of all their valuable books, instruments and all scientific apparatus. The local government has invited the Ottoman schools and permitted to occupy the vacated premises of the French. We have some of the British refugees in our house.

The news that trickles through from foreign countries is not at all encouraging. Meanwhile negotiations for the combined Turko-German attack on Egypt seem to be proceeding with vigor. Whether or not this expedition will ever be an actual operation depends, I suppose, on the news from Europe. The effects upon the interests in Syria are very real and depressing. The stern necessities of martial law will be enforced. The Turko-German authorities to command the medical and surgical outfits of even the Protestant College. And the action of the belligerents would allow them to take away the British members of the faculty, unless the government at Washington is able to prevent in some way. Another batch of rumors is being spread under the circumstances disturb the students to such an extent that the work of the college would be seriously hampered. This for the moment the most imminent possibility.

If British subjects in general should be sent into the interior as already threatened, we should lose some of our best workers. It would take twenty Englishmen in all from our community, with the exception of three or four, who might avail themselves of the permission to leave in case the same privilege is accorded to the British that has actually been given to the French religious workers.

The ladies of the station are besieged by people in actual distress. They have begun to distribute flour in a small way because we have very little money available for any such purpose. Moreover, because Beirut and vicinity are in danger of being cut off from Damascus, which has commandeered all the wheat and provisions of the country, there has been great difficulty in obtaining flour at any price. We hope this state of affairs may be remedied without actual famine resulting.

The people of Lebanon are in great distress over the uncertainty as to the continuation of their privileges, which have been guaranteed and enjoyed since 1860, by the Powers. Turkish troops are slowly being moved into the Lebanon, which in the minds of the people threatens the continuance of their immunities and foreshadows possible bloodshed in case the suspicions of the military government should lead them to attempt the disarming of the Christians dwelling in the Lebanon. We watch the development of this situation with considerable anxiety. If, however, the whole European situation changes in the direction of peace the whole situation here will be eased automatically.

Our regular mission work is proceeding as well as we could expect under these circumstances. The minds of the people are more than usually open to spiritual matters and the attendance upon all religious services is greater than usual, especially when you take into consideration the large numbers of all classes who have fled to Cyprus, Egypt, and countries further away.

FULL TEXT OF AMERICAN NOTES TO GERMANY AND ENGLAND ON OUR SHIPS AND FLAG

TO GERMANY

WASHINGTON, Feb. 10, 1915. —The secretary of state has instructed Ambassador Gerard at Berlin to present to the German Government a note to the following effect:

The Government of the United States, having had its attention directed to the proclamation of the German Admiralty, issued on the 4th of February, that the waters surrounding Great Britain and Ireland, including the whole of the English Channel, are to be considered as comprised within the seat of war; that all enemy merchant vessels found in those waters after the 18th inst. will be destroyed, although it may not always be possible to save the crews and passengers; and that neutral vessels expose themselves to danger within this zone of war because, in view of the misuse of neutral flags, said to have been ordered by the British Government on the 31st of January, and of the contingencies of maritime warfare, it may not be possible always to exempt neutral vessels from attacks intended to strike enemy ships, feels it to be its duty to call the attention of the Imperial German Government, with sincere respect and the most friendly sentiments, but very candidly and earnestly, to the very serious possibilities of the course of action apparently contemplated under that proclamation.

The Government of the United States views those possibilities with such grave concern that it feels it to be its privilege, and, indeed, its duty, in the circumstances to request the Imperial German Government to consider before action is taken the critical situation in respect of the relation between this country and Germany which might arise were the German naval forces, in carrying out the policy foreshadowed in the Admiralty's proclamation, to destroy any merchant vessel of the United States or cause the death of any American citizens.

It is, of course, not necessary to remind the German Government that the sole right of a belligerent in dealing with neutral vessels on the high seas is limited to visit and search, unless a blockade is proclaimed and effectively maintained, which this government does not understand to be proposed in this case. To declare or exercise a right to attack and destroy any vessel entering a prescribed area of the high seas without first certainly determining its belligerent nationality and the contraband character of its cargo would be an act so unprecedented in naval warfare that this government is reluctant to believe that the Imperial Government of Germany in this case contemplates it as possible.

The suspicion that enemy ships are using neutral flags improperly can create no just presumption that all ships traversing a prescribed area are subject to the same suspicion. It is to determine exactly such questions that this government understands the right of visit and search to have been recognized.

This government has carefully noted the explanatory statement issued by the Imperial German Government at the same time with the proclamation of the German Admiralty, and takes this occasion to remind the Imperial German Government very respectfully that the Government of the United States is open to none of the criticisms for unneutral action to which the German Government believes the governments of certain other neutral nations have laid themselves open; that the Government of the United States has not consented to or acquiesced in any measures which may have been taken by the other belligerent nations in the present war, which operate to restrain neutral trade, but has, on the contrary, taken, in all such position which warrants it those governments responsible in proper way for any untoward American shipping which the principles of international law justify; and that it, therefore, itself as free in the present instance to take with a clear conscience upon accepted principles the position indicated in this note.

If the commanders of German vessels of war should act upon the presumption that the flag of the United States was not being used in good faith and should destroy or seize an American vessel or the lives of American citizens, it would be difficult for the Government of the United States to view the matter in other light than as an indefensible violation of neutral rights, which would be very hard, indeed, to reconcile with the friendly relations happily subsisting between the two governments.

If such a deplorable situation should arise, the Imperial German Government can readily appreciate that the Government of the United States would be constrained to hold the Imperial Government of Germany to strict accountability for such acts of their naval authorities, and any steps it might be necessary to take to safeguard American lives and property and to secure to American citizens the full enjoyment of their acknowledged rights on the high seas.

The Government of the United States, in view of these considerations which it urges with the greatest respect and with the sincere purpose of making sure that no misunderstandings may arise and no circumstances occur that might even cloud the intercourse of the two governments, expresses the confident hope and expectation that the Imperial German Government can and will give assurance that American citizens and their vessels will not be molested by the naval forces of Germany carried out by visit and search, that their vessels may be traversing the area delimited by the proclamation of the German Admiralty.

It is stated for the information of the Imperial Government that representations have been made to the British Majesty's Government, in respect to the unwarranted use of the American flag for the protection of British ships.

TO ENGLAND

WASHINGTON, Feb. 10, 1915. The secretary of state has instructed Ambassador Page at London to present to the British Government a note to the following effect:

The department has been advised of the declaration of the German Admiralty on February 4, indicating that the British Government had on January 31 explicitly authorized the use of neutral flags on British merchant vessels, presumably for the purpose of avoiding recognition by German naval forces. The department's action has also been directed to reject in the press that the captain of the Lusitania, acting upon orders or information received from the British authorities, raised the American flag as his vessel approached the Irish coasts, in order to escape anti-submarine attacks by German submarines. The day's press reports also contained an alleged official statement of the foreign office defending the use of the flag of a neutral country by a belligerent vessel in order to escape capture or attack by an enemy.

Assuming that the foregoing are true, the Government of the United States, reserving for consideration the legality and propriety of the deceptive use of the

FLORENCE

Oil Cook Stoves "Look for the Lever"

You need have a hot summer kitchen no more. Florence Oil Cook Stoves are ready when you want to cook. As much heat as you want, when you want it, right where you want it—in the kitchen, not out in the room.

Housewives all over America are finding that Florence Oil Stoves solve the cooking question. Thousands of merchants have wakened to the fact that here are such dependable, safe, convenient oil stoves as they've always wished to sell.

Florence Oil Stoves are so simple, so sure, so little trouble. You light a match. You turn a lever. You have a clean, intensely hot blue flame right up under the cooking.

Florence Oil Stoves change every drop of oil to gas. This mixes with oxygen from the air and burns with intense heat, with a clean, blue flame.

By easy little turns of the lever you have an intensely hot or a simmering flame. The heat goes upward into the cooking instead of outward into the kitchen. The lever turned—the flame is out.

These stoves have no wicks to be trimmed, to smoke, scent and soot the house—no valves to wear out, or clog, or leak.

Each burner costs about one-half cent an hour. Much cheaper than a coal range or gas. There are no plumber's bills for connecting and disconnecting.

Suppose you want to bake. No vexing wait for a stubborn coal fire. In a few minutes your Florence oven is ready for six large loaves.

Through the glass door you see the ruddy crust brought only by uniform heat. It is visible baking. That means good baking.

When the baking's done the fire is turned off. Your kitchen was not overheated. The heat was concentrated under the oven or cooking utensil.

The oil tank has an unbreakable glass front (or bull's eye) that shows you the amount of oil at any time. The tank holds a full gallon of oil. Water cannot spill into its lower reservoir or pipes.

All Florence Stoves and Ovens are fully guaranteed. We believe the Florence Automatic principle the best for oil cook stoves. Others cannot use it. We own the patents.

STANDING OF THE DENOMINATIONS

Latest Statistics of the Churches of the United States for the Past Year

STATISTICAL tables showing the progress of the various religious bodies in the United States during the year just closed have been prepared by Dr. H. K. Carroll, who had charge of the Government Religious Census of Churches. These tables, which are now issued by the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, show that the religious bodies have no cause to be discouraged over the results of the last twelvemonth's labors.

The grand total of members of all the bodies, Catholic included, is now 38,708,149. All the larger denominations share in the increase. Baptists gained 122,125; Eastern Orthodox churches, 36,500; the Roman Catholic Church 136,850, the Lutherans 56,248, the German Evangelical Synod, representing the State Church of Prussia, 29,315; the Methodists 231,460, the Presbyterians 56,019, the Protestant Episcopal Church 28,641. The Protestant Episcopal Church has crossed the million line, having gained 86,468 since 1910, and over 300,000 since 1900. The Roman Catholic Church has gained nearly a million and a quarter since 1910, and more than five and a half millions since 1900. The Methodist Episcopal Church, the second largest denomination, gained nearly 700,000 since 1900.

The thirty churches constituting the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America report nearly 17,500,000 members, somewhat less than half of the aggregate for all denominations, with 103,000 ministers and nearly 139,000 churches. These bodies have a net increase of over 500,000 members, or more than two-thirds the entire increase of all bodies.

There are nine denominations which have a million and upward, the Roman Catholic 13,794,637, the Methodist Episcopal 3,603,265, the Southern Baptist 2,592,217, the National Baptist (colored) 2,018,868, the Methodist Episcopal, South, 2,005,707; the Presbyterian, Northern, 1,442,498; the Disciples of Christ 1,363,163, the Northern Baptist Convention 1,238,323, and the Protestant Episcopal 1,015,238. These seven denominations aggregate over 29,000,000 members, or more than three-fourths of the entire aggregate of the 170 religious bodies.

The effects on church membership of the European war in narrowing the stream of immigration were probably quite small, as only the last five months of the year were involved. The German bodies—Lutheran, Reformed, and the representative of the Prussian State Church, all show unusual gains for 1914. On the other hand, Roman Catholic gains are quite small.

Dr. Carroll's report says: "It is necessary to give again a word of explanation concerning the figures for the Roman Catholic Church in the column of communicants. The Official Catholic Directory reports only 'population,' which includes with communicants the unconfirmed baptized; that is, children who have not been admitted to their first communion. The rule adopted in the census of 1890, and followed in that of 1906, deducts 15 per cent. from Catholic population and sets down the remaining 85 per cent. as communicants. Representatives of that church object to the process, but as the rule to report only members or communicants is applied to all other denominations, there is obviously no convenient way of making an exception in this case. It should also be said that the figures for 'population' are for a large number of dioceses and archdioceses estimates, given in round numbers, as, for example, Baltimore, 261,000; Boston, 900,000; Cincinnati, 200,000.

"The grand total of communicants for 1913 was swelled by an abnormal increase reported by the Roman Catholic Church. A great body of Ruthenian Catholics, not included in the returns of previous years, were put into the tables, and this made the gains appear much larger than they really were, for the Ruthenians have been coming to the United States for years. A round 500,000 was added for them last year.

"The figures for Jewish members are misleading. The denomination furnishes no statistics, and nothing later than the figures gathered directly by circular from congregations by the government in its census of 1906 is obtainable. The census gives an even smaller number of members than this table, counting only heads of families, according to the Jewish rule. The number of adults connected with Jewish congregations must be 700,000 or more."

the enemy their own losses are greater than originally stated. The fighting at Ilkantara was also more severe than supposed. The important point, however, is that the Turks reached the canal itself and that they had artillery. The main armies cannot, therefore, be far away, and at any time, it would seem, we are liable to hear of severe fighting on the canal. The second Australian contingent reached there apparently in the nick of time for the Allies.

The Turks and Russians have bombarded each others' towns along the Black Sea during the week, but we are absolutely without news of the combats of their land forces in the Transcaucasus or in Persia. The bombardment of the Dardanelles is still going on, but with the most insignificant results. Uneasiness is reported from Afghanistan, Beluchistan and Southern Persia, which is said to be a result of the proclamation of the "holy war." However this may be, conditions at the moment are not acute.

The Galician campaign is extremely interesting. The Russians seem to be abandoning the western and south-western portions of this province and withdrawing toward Przemyśl and Lemberg. Roughly speaking, the Austrians and Germans—the armies of the two nations are now fighting together here—occupy a line beginning at a little to the west of Tarnow, running thence south to Sandec, thence to the Carpathians, and seemingly, according to the Russian statements themselves, to control the passes Tilicz, Dukla, Mezo, Laborez, Lupko and Uskok, leading into Hungary.

This joint army is said to be in great force and has forced the Russians backward pretty well all along this line. Another Austro-German army has concentrated directly south of Lemberg, in and around Nedoworna, and apparently these two forces are working together with the object of relieving Przemyśl and retaking Lemberg. At the present writing the advance points of the Austro-German forces are within sixty-five miles of Lemberg and a little less than thirty of Przemyśl. The Russians have lost heavily in this fighting, both in casualties, prisoners and munitions of war.

In southern Bukowina the passes into both Hungary and Transylvania have been completely cleared of the Russians, Kimpolung recaptured, and the Russians forced to the north of the town of Wana, a railway junction point of local importance which has fallen into Austrian hands. At the moment of closing this article a bulletin has come, announcing another Russian defeat farther to the north in Bukowina at Suczawa and the abandonment of Czernowitz, the capital, by them, but no details are given. The Petrograd bulletins admit these reverses in this terrain.

The fighting in Poland this last week has been concentrated on a six or seven-mile line to the east of Borjinow. Here an intense battle raged for three days, and terminated with the Germans holding the field. Losses on both sides are said to have been tremendous, in proportion to the numbers engaged.

Outside of this fight the week has been very quiet in Poland, with the exception of uninteresting and unimportant skirmishes here and there, some between infantry, but the majority between cavalry forces on the north bank of the Vistula, towards Thorn, and in North Poland, in the neighborhood of Mlaw.

In East Prussia the Russians made an advance of about ten miles from their frontier in the direction of Tilsit and there encountered a German force which was able to hold them. Both sides have been heavily reinforced since then, and apparently things are so shaping themselves that a battle of more than ordinary size will probably soon take place somewhere in East Prussia, between Lasdehen and Gumbinnen in the so-called Masurian Lake region.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETING

NOTES ON THE CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR, EPWORTH LEAGUE AND BAPTIST YOUNG PEOPLE'S UNION TOPICS

How to Make This a Happier World

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U.
Topic for March 7. Prov. 3: 13-18
(Consecration meeting)

THE world is a big place. Can we do anything to increase its happiness? Indeed we can. That is our business.

We can do it, first, by letting Christ make us happy. Happiness is catching. If we are to spread joy we must have it.

Second. By telling others about the Christ we have found.

Third. By being helpful in other ways, by watching out for opportunities to relieve the distresses of people and bring them gladness for mind and body, as well as soul. New York had a "Bundle Day" on February 4. People brought to appointed stations bundles of clothing and supplies for the unemployed. It was an inspiration to see a big special bin at a railway terminal filling up with bundles for the poor. The people enjoyed giving; the poor enjoyed receiving. Another city asked its people to give a day's salary or wages to the poor. Here was another plan for spreading joy.

Fourth. This really belongs with three, but it is so important it must be counted separately: Be kind and cheerful at home. Be a "joy-spreader" there.

Fifth. Fight hard to right some of the fundamental wrongs of society, and to bring about justice. Millions are barred from happiness because they are deprived of simple justice—the opportunity to work and to live in reasonable content.

Sixth. This belongs with No. 2, but should have special mention. Do some definite work as a missionary or evangelist. Be a missionary giver if you can not be a missionary. Be a soul-winner—watching for opportunities to bring people to Jesus.

Seventh. Learn the true wisdom, described in our Scripture reference and in James 3: 17-18. Be a pupil of Jesus and try to teach others what he teaches you.

The Promise of Sonship to God

Epworth League Topic for March 11
II Cor. 6: 16-18; Gal. 3: 26-28
8: 14-16, 21

DID you ever really try to love the love your father and mother have for you, the love they have ever since you came, as a child, to brighten their lives? God loves you like that, only with infinitely greater tenderness. He wants you to be his son or daughter, with all the love and gladness and help and blessing that implies.

Jesus shows the way to this sonship. He takes away the things which alienate us from God, such as sin, and come close into the sweet home of heaven.

We must separate ourselves from sin and from harmful companions. We must keep ourselves clean after Christ has cleansed us. So we may enjoy the delight of God's love and be heirs of the vastly greater lights to come.

Remember that sonship of God does not free us from life's trials. We are called upon to suffer, for Father and our Elder Brother will keep our souls blessed even when our minds and bodies may be distressed.

If we are the sons of God, we must bear the family resemblance, trying every day to be like him, so that others will understand and love our Father.

And we must try to win all who can reach into the joys of our home circle.

Beside the beautiful Scripture passages assigned for our study, which should be read word for word at the meeting, look up these also: John 1: 12; Jer. 31: 1-9; Isa. 66: 1-5; Peter 1: 4. Find other passages about God's fatherhood and our sons.

THE AMERICAN NOTES

a neutral power in any case for the purpose of avoiding capture, desires very respectfully to point out to His Britannic Majesty's Government the serious consequences which may result to American vessels and American citizens if this practice is continued.

The occasional use of the flag of a neutral or an enemy, under the stress of immediate pursuit and to deceive an approaching enemy, which appears by the press reports to be represented as the precedent and justification used to support this action, seems to this government a very different thing from an explicit sanction by a belligerent government for its merchant ships generally to fly the flag of a neutral power within certain portions of the high seas, which are presumed to be frequented with hostile warships. The formal declaration of such a policy of general misuse of a neutral's flag jeopardizes the vessels of the neutral visiting those waters in a peculiar degree by raising the presumption that they are of belligerent nationality regardless of the flag which they may carry.

In view of the announced purpose of the German Admiralty to engage in active naval operations in certain delimited sea areas adjacent to the coasts of Great Britain and Ireland, the Government of the United States would view with anxious solicitude any general use of the flag of the United States by British vessels traversing those waters. A policy such as the one which His Majesty's Government is said to intend to adopt, would, if the declaration of the German Admiralty be put in force, it seems clear, afford no protection to British vessels while it would be a serious and constant menace to the lives and souls of American citizens.

The Government of the United States, therefore, trusts that His Majesty's Government will do all in its power to restrain vessels of belligerent nationality in the deceptive use of the United States flag in the sea as defined by the German declaration. Since such practice would greatly endanger the vessels of a friendly power, by gating those waters and would seem to impose upon the Government of Great Britain a measure of responsibility for the loss of American lives and vessels in case of an attack by a German naval force.

You will impress upon His Majesty's Government the grave concern which this government feels in the circumstances in regard to the safety of American vessels and lives in the war zone declared by the German Admiralty.

You may add that this government is making earnest representation to the German Government in regard to the danger to American vessels and citizens if the declaration of the German Admiralty is put into effect.

Do You Know Your Bible?

A special emergency, brought about by the appearance of important news, which could not be omitted, makes it necessary to postpone the publication of the new list of questions in the Bible contest. They will appear next week, together with Honor and correct answers to List No.

*A Perfect, Seamless, Aluminum-Lined
12-Quart Fireless Cookstove, $8.00*

Better cooked food and 50% saving in fuel. That's what it will mean to you to have a Caloric Junior Fireless Cookstove in your kitchen.

This wonderful, new model removes from fireless cookery the one great inconvenience that heretofore has almost over-shadowed its usefulness, namely, the necessity of handling and cleaning radiators. The

Caloric
JUNIOR

Fireless Cookstove

(No radiators to heat, clean or handle) is almost as convenient as an extra maid. You simply put your dinner into the Caloric, put the Caloric on the stove, allow it to heat for a little while—that's all the heat needed to cook the dinner. Your time is your own for the rest of the day.

The food cannot burn—the Caloric patented Ventilating Valve prevents that. And such cooking as it does! Better than you have ever been able to obtain by any other means.

With a Caloric Junior you can cut down on your table allowance (because the food goes farther) save fuel, roast, bake, boil and stew with most satisfactory results and just about double your leisure hours.

The Caloric Junior does not cost more—it costs less—$8.00 for a perfect 12-quart Caloric Junior. The Caloric Junior Electric attaches to any light socket, $12.00.

"Wear-Ever" Aluminum Windsor Kettle

Place empty kettle on stove over a low flame; in heated kettle sear roast on all sides; turn down fire to a mere flicker. When half done turn meat over. Thus cheaper cuts of meat may be made as palatable as the most expensive cuts.

The "Wear-Ever" Windsor Kettle may be used for many purposes every day in the year.

With "Wear-Ever" Utensils you can cook rice that is dry and flaky without stirring—apples and potatoes that bake on the top of the stove—cakes that bake evenly without turning—griddle cakes that are light and crisp without grease.

Aluminum utensils are not "all the same"
The enormous pressure of rolling mills and stamping machines makes the metal in "Wear-Ever" utensils dense and smooth, hard and rigid. They give enduring satisfaction.

DEATH OF NEW YORK'S OLDEST PASTOR

SOMETIMES when one sets out on a quest for the chief man, or the oldest man, or the most learned, one is doomed to a disappointment. During recent years the question came up from time to time: "Who is the oldest pastor in New York?" If an editor did not happen to remember someone was sent to find out, or if he did remember, someone was likely to be sent out anyway to have another interview with New York's oldest pastor. Whether the investigator knew beforehand or started out to make fresh inquiry, he experienced at the end of his search a sensation of complete satisfaction and delight. If he had drawn in his mind a most exalted idea of who and what the oldest pastor of a great city should be, he felt on seeing the man himself that the reality was better than the best that could have been fancied.

DR. J. H. OERTER

Modest, devout, scholarly, friendly, John H. Oerter served his fifty-seven years as pastor of a New York City church, the same church from beginning to end, awakened to spiritual life and quickened to deeper life hundreds of souls, was counselor and friend in many homes, stood in his neighborhood for cleanliness and righteousness, and by his writings and lectures helped to spread to other communities the sweet and sturdy truths of the Gospel he loved. To sit in his quiet study with this man of God and talk over the events of his long and beautiful life was a refreshment for mind and soul.

Dr. Oerter was born in Germany in 1831, came to New York in 1852, was graduated from the Theological Seminary at New Brunswick, N. J., in 1856, and was called, after a two-year pastorate at Warren, N. J., to the Fourth German Reformed Church of New York. This church had just been organized, and Dr. Oerter was its first pastor. After worshiping in various halls the congregation built a church in West Fortieth Street. Later another church building was erected on Forty-fifth Street, and here Dr. Oerter lived and labored until death suddenly called him home Sunday, January 24, at the age of 84. He had preached to his people two weeks before and, not realizing that his illness was serious, they were stunned by the news of his sudden death.

At his funeral service children and aged and middle-aged met and wept together as brother pastors testified to his purity of character, his fidelity and his staunch faith in the Gospel of Christ. Rev. E. G. W. Meury, president of the Classis of New York, said in his address, "No man in this city was ever a better pastor. In rain and snow, cold and heat, early and late, even with impaired health and faulty vision, he could be seen visiting his people. How we all shall miss the benediction of his beloved face as he passed along our streets! His life had but one purpose and his death can leave but one testimony. He walked with God, and all who walked with him came closer to God."

Some years ago, on the occasion of his fiftieth anniversary as the pastor of the Fourth Church, the New York Classis presented Dr. Oerter with a testimonial in which these words are found: "We dwell with peculiar satisfaction upon the sustained usefulness of your ministry, its exalted patience, its tender sympathy, its unfaltering courage. It interprets to us the divine ideal of Father, Brother, Friend. Such a pastorate is the noblest picture of human influence and of the relationship of man which the world has to show."

Dr. Oerter is survived by his widow, to whom he was married fifty-nine years ago, and a son and daughter.

Resinol Soap will clear it or really help to do so—in a normal, healthy way. It is so easy too:

Just bathe your face for several minutes with Resinol Soap and hot water, working the creamy lather into the skin gently with the finger-tips. Then wash off with more Resinol Soap and warm water, finishing with a dash of leak cold water to close the pores.
Do this regularly once or twice a day, and you will be astonished how quickly the healing, antiseptic Resinol meditation soothes and cleanses the

labor might have eased the pain and suspense. With brain pulsing and aching, how could he write—how think connectedly?

He sat down mechanically before his battered old typewriter. If only he could write something! He felt that he should go mad if he sat still in this torpor of inaction. And he felt too tired to drag himself about the streets. . . .

Suddenly he remembered a bit of advice some one had given him: "Put your heartache in your work." He shrugged, and plucked aimlessly at the cover of the table. He could make it realistic enough if the words would come. Write of his own agony, straight out of his heart? Well—perhaps; and somewhere a soul would read and say, "He understands."

He began to write. The letters fell slowly on the white page. They had a gray look; they ached with hopelessness. He stared down at them with compressed lips. Of what use to any human being was that cry of despair?
He pushed back his chair and went over to the window. Long he stood there, looking out upon the streets.
Then almost subconsciously he was aware that something had happened.
People were not carrying umbrellas any longer; there was a sort of glow on the pavement. He looked up expectantly. Through the dun sky a rift of light showed. Why, the sun had come out! It had been shining while he was pouring out that jumble of unfaith in God and man. . . .

He stumbled back to the typewriter and sat down, his head on his hands.
That the sun could shine while Marjorie was so ill! Why, the rain was more sympathetic to his sorrow. And yet—oh, God grant that for him the sun was yet to shine!

Out of the chaos of his mind came a haunting, singing line:

In the mire and gloom of things
Something always, always sings . . .

Long he sat brooding before the silent, mechanical thing that gave him back his thoughts in cold, neat type.
After all, the world is full enough of heartbreak. Crowded with unfaith.
Should he deepen it? Living or dying,
Marjorie was in God's hands—and God was his friend. In spite of his suffering, he was quite sure of that.

He crumpled together the despairing sheets he had written and tossed them from him. Then, above the ache of his heart, he answered that singing line.
He wrote of the sunlight through the gray—of the rift of light that always comes through darkness, of God's patient love for his fretful, misunderstanding children, and of the beauty of simple faith. Every word seemed torn out of the fibers of his hurt—but he kept on. And when he had finished, he smiled—for the thing he had written was inspired. It pulsed with beauty and light and tenderness, yet with subtle acceptance and understanding.

All was right with the world, for "God's in his heaven." When we cannot understand we can hope, and when we can no longer hope we can trust.

And yet it was not trite. Newer and graver perception of divine purpose is never so. Old—old, yes, but never trite, the cry of "Courage!" to our fellow men, the call to faith in a higher Force. Many would read and understand—and take heart again.

Reverently he laid the sheets aside.
They were his prayer to God for the little life he loved. It wasn't an easy thing to do, but out of his own pain he had given the world a message of optimism and good cheer. After all, it was only another way of saying:
"Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him . . ."

The telephone bell jangled. Some one called his name. He sprang to listen. The surgeon was speaking.

" . . . very successful operation.
Not the least fear for her. . . . Yes?

" . . . Why, man, she'll be up and about in a few weeks. Come around as soon as you like, of course."

He turned his glowing face to the rift of light shining through the gray.
"I thank thee, Lord!" he said.

DODGE BROTHERS MOTOR CAR

Beauty plays a large part in the owner's pride of possession. One reason why this car has appealed strongly to the public is that its appearance invariably inspires admiration.

The fenders are singularly beautiful. It would be difficult to imagine a cowl more graceful, or a radiator more shapely. There is a true streamline effect flowing and unbroken from end to end. The real leather gives richness to the upholstery.

The wheelbase is 110 inches.
The price of the car complete is $785

THE PRAYER LEAGUE

SOME of our new subscribers are asking for more details as to the plan of work of the Prayer League. The organization is very informal. Its membership now numbers about six thousand. All who send in requests for prayer or acknowledgments of answered prayer are enrolled in the Christian Herald office as members of the Prayer League.

It is requested that every day at noon each member of the League make special prayer for all the other members, bearing particularly in mind the requests for prayer presented in the current issue of the Christian Herald. As has been suggested before, even if it is not possible to retire for secret prayer, there may be the "upward glancing" of the heart and the reaching out in sympathy for all those who have made their needs known to the Prayer League.

Where it is possible, it is urged that members of the Prayer League meet together at this noon hour or at some other hour of the day or week and pray unitedly for the objects mentioned. We are urged to pray with the thoughts of others' needs taking a larger place in our minds than our own needs. In this way the Christian Herald Prayer League becomes a sympathetic band of earnest souls eager to become channels of blessing through which God's Spirit may flow for the healing of souls and bodies, for the refreshing of churches, the guidance and blessing of nations.

In regard to the prayers for bodily healing we are often asked whether the Prayer League believes in the use of medicines and employment of physicians. The answer is always, heartily and emphatically, yes. We believe that the Holy Spirit has guided and blessed the minds of men in mastering the facts of the human body and of discovering the best means of retaining and restoring health. God is in his created material world as well as in the world of spirit, and he can and will bless the proper remedies to the good of bodies and increase the skill of our physicians. In case of serious illness there should be no delay in summoning the best available doctor. While the doctor is at work and the remedies are applied, godly friends of those who are sick should pray that God himself will bless physician and remedies and that life and health will triumph over disease and death.

A. A. P. writes acknowledging answer to prayer for strengthening of mind and hands. M. E. B. writes from Tyner, Sask.: "Some months ago I wrote asking prayer for a brother. We are so rejoiced, as he is most gloriously saved, and declares that now he is a servant of God." A Friend writes from Michigan: "I was worried and in trouble and had lost all trace of a very dear friend. I prayed and prayed for help. At last my prayers were answered and I am so grateful." Mrs. C. R. R. writes from San Antonio, Texas: "In September I was very ill; my life was despaired of. My recovery was a little less than a miracle; so says my physician. I am up, growing stronger each day. I feel that I was saved through special prayer."

Acknowledgments of answers to prayer have also been received from:

A. M. A., Keeseville, N. Y.; M. M. J., Jacksonville, Ill. (for special help in a business matter); Mrs. N. P. C., Cook, Ohio (for restoration to health of two sons); R. M. B., La Grange, Ky.; A. Reader, Barton, Vt.; Mrs. C. L. H., Kingman, Ariz.; M. A. B., Brownsville, Calif.; Mrs. D., Detroit, Mich. (for three definite answers to prayer); M. S. H., Canada (for healing and the conversion of four friends); Mrs. M. E. H., Allenton, Ill. (for healing of sister); Mrs. W. T., Ontario, N. Y. (for healing of a neighbor); Mrs. F. W., Rockton, Wis.; Mrs. C. O. M., Beatrice, Neb.

A telegram from Mrs. C. A. J. of Bluefield, W. Va., reads: "Please pray for my husband's recovery from a severe operation." A Wife writes to ask prayer that her husband's case at court regarding title to property may be settled justly. A widow seventy years old writes to ask prayer that justice may be done her in the settlement of her husband's estate. He died leaving ing no will, and others are trying to deprive her of the property.

Prayers are asked for rivals in Jamesport, Mo.; Laval, Wis.; Barre, City, Iowa; Geddes, S. D.; Sch. Waco, Texas. For revival meetings held or soon to be held at Marion, Ohio; the Baptist church in Lewiston, Idaho. For revival at Methodist Church at Versa, Ohio (and for gracious revival in community); a church at Wanton, Vt.; a church in Chicago, Ill. That church at Pleasant Hill, Ore. guided through a time of trial a Spirit-filled minister may a church at South Waco, Tex. that there may be a revival of religion there. For success of school at Altapass, N. C., and conversions among its members. Holy Spirit may guide the preparations of the Christians of Greater New York for evangelist Sunday's campaign that many may be converted, many Hebrews. That a minister may be sent to a church at Jamesport, Mo. and be successful in building up.

A Subscriber asks prayer that mother's mind may be restored. A. B. her son's; Mrs. L., her brother. Nine other friends ask prayer for mental restoration or strengthening of other relatives or friends or for themselves.

Thirty-seven friends ask prayer for a deeper work of grace, assurance sins forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing, including two who as prayer to be saved.

Nineteen friends ask prayer that relatives or friends may be delivered from the drink habit or resist the temptation to drink.

A Wife asks prayer that her husband may be saved from the opium habit. Two other friends to be secured of the drug habit. Twenty-seven parents ask prayer for the conversion of sons. Sixteen wives ask prayer for the conversion of their husbands. Forty-five friends ask prayer for the restoration of other relatives and friends.

Eighteen readers ask prayer for special spiritual blessing for relatives or friends, including one that God richest blessings may rest upon a missionary and her work, also upon her other in the home land.

Six wives ask prayer for the healing of husbands; twenty-two parents for the healing of their daughters, including one that daughter may be cured of infantile paralysis; six sons or daughters for the healing of their mothers. Forty-five friends ask prayer for the healing of other relatives and friends, including one that the mother of a young child may be restored to health; fifty-one for the healing of their lives, including one that she may be strengthened in her old age; another that goiter may be removed.

Ten friends ask prayer for healing of hearing for themselves or other friends.

Forty friends ask prayer for guidance in financial affairs, including one that she may be able to provide a home for her aged parents; another that a great financial loss which threatened may be averted; another that mother may receive financial aid; and another that a way may be found for an old couple to meet payment of home.

Sixty-four friends ask prayer for the granting of varied desires and needs, including one that sister herself may obtain an education; be able to make their own living; other that strength may be supplied to bear the death of husband; another that she may be pardoned and released from prison; and another that a boy ten or twelve years of age sent to their home; they want to poor boy a home.

HIGHLY VALUED

The Christian Herald brings a blessing in every week, and it is worth its weight in gold. It has been a subscriber for sixteen years, and grows dearer and it brings more love and joy in our hearts. God bless you. This paper is three other families too.

"BOSS"

have proved a blessing to thousands and thousands of women, who, tired of the disorder, long, tedious hours of hard labor, backaches, pains and sickness, have thrown out the old wash-tub and wash-board and use the "BOSS" way.

Merely you do not love wash-day's hard work. There's no bending over a wash-board for hours, inhaling the anxious steam from the dirty wash water and wearing out your strength. Then why not rid yourself of this unnecessary drudgery now and forever? You can do it from the moment you install a Boss Washing Machine. It washes with the famous Boss principle—which no other washing machine possesses—and therein lies the keynote of its popularity and immense success.

For more than 25 years Boss Washing Machines have proven their superiority, and to this day are known to be machines that really wash clothes clean, so they do not have to be rubbed towards by hand.

Your own experience tells you that agitation alone does not wash clothes clean—neither does a mere vacuum, suction or rubbing do it. Nothing short of rubbing, agitation, vacuum and suction, all combined into one action, can wash clothes clean. This combined action is the Boss principle.

That is why the Boss takes out every speck of dirt without injury to the finest fabrics.

The Boss will make your wash sweeter and cleaner than you have ever known it to be—it will enable you to do your washing in minutes instead of hours. Can you afford to be without its help another day?

EVERY BOSS IS SOLD ON 30 DAYS' TRIAL AND GUARANTEED TO DO WHAT WE SAY IT WILL.

Our reputation is your insurance. We have made Washing Machines for more than twenty-five years, and operate the largest exclusive Washing Machine factory in the world.

No matter whether you prefer a Boss to operate by hand, electricity, engine power or water motor—make your selection today—but be sure you get a BOSS. If you cannot obtain one at any of your local Hardware or General Stores, write direct to us and we will see that you are supplied. Write to us now for our interesting Booklet.

Principle

I have used your Boss Washing Machine for 12 years now and I never washed with a better machine, and I have now bought me a new one.
Mrs. Joseph DeKalver, Luxemburg, Sask., Can.

We are more than pleased with our "BOSS" washer. Have had three or four other kinds but like the "BOSS" the best of all.

Mrs. S. L. Hunt,
328 W. Main Street,
Walla Walla, Wash.

I purchased our Boss washing machine at Crosswell, Mich., 7 years ago and it has been in regular use every week since. We have had a number of washing machines before we got the "BOSS" and I have seen quite a variety of machines since, but none equal to the "BOSS" in our opinion. For a hand washing machine it is as complete as can be made.

A. J. Holmes,
Pastor M. E. Church,
Auburn, Mich.

We have now used your Boss Washing Machine for the last seventeen years, and it is still in very good condition.

M. C. Sieggrosser,
1030 Central Ave.,
Wilmette, Ill.

I have just bought my second Boss Washing Machine in 18 years. I still have my first Boss and it is good yet, except for the need of a few new parts—so you can see that your machine is very durable.

Samuel Gibeau,
Red Lake Falls, Minn.

We have one of your Boss Washers and like it very much having used it for two families for fourteen years.

A. Vance Smith,
Valois, N. Y.

The No. 2 "BOSS" ordered from you on September 12th has been received and is in use today. As we have used one of the "BOSS" machines constantly for ten years, it is needless to say that we are well pleased. It does the work perfectly.

Geo. H. Sturgeon, Creston, Cal.

I have just bought of the Clarke Hardware Company, of Jamestown, one of your No. 2 "BOSS" washers after trying it with a 1900 Junior. We have worn out two of the Vandergrift and have used most of the best makes, but consider your "BOSS" the best of all.

What Clarkson is Doing for the Book Buyer

In several hundred thousand libraries in the homes of people in every walk of life—from the day laborer to the college professor and high government official, from the persons who buy a few books of popular fiction to the persons who pride themselves on having the complete works of all the standard authors in De Luxe Editions artistically printed and bound—almost every book was bought from me. Why? Because, I have no agents and sell you just the books you want—all new—many at a saving of 50 to 90 per cent—you examine the books in your own home for five days before paying for them. If not satisfied, return them at my expense—and owe me nothing.

Sample Prices:

The Eyes of the World, 90c
The Yesterday, 35c
Winning of Barbara Worth, 35c
Calling of Dan Matthews, 35c
Library of Oratory, 15 vols., publisher's price $15—my price $4.75
Shakespeare, 40 vol. full flexible Morocco, largest type and best notes of any Shakespeare published, publisher's price $36—my price $24
Here are De Luxe Editions, Morocco bound, complete works, many of them at less than 25 cents on the dollar. Hugo, Kipling, Poe, Eliot, Dickens, Thackeray, Scott and scores of others.

My new catalog, sent free for the asking, tells you how to save 50 to 90 per cent on thousands of books. It is a course in literature, giving nationalities, date of birth and death of authors, the author's life and standing in literature, etc. Hundreds of sets and thousands of single volumes listed.

I sell more books direct to the booklover—the individual reader—the rich man who insists upon his dollar's worth—the man who watches his pennies—and sell them for less money—than any other man in America. Every book new and fresh, and guaranteed to please you—you to be the judge. I do not quibble, and would rather have a book or set of books returned at my expense than to have a dissatisfied customer.

There can be no good citizenship where the Ten Commandments are broken or infringed. Nothing of political reform, no movements in social reform, that are not built upon the Ten Commandments, and when I say to you that I stand firm and square on the Ten Commandments, and when this old world is turned to ashes, I will have a foundation as sure and enduring as the God upon whose law I stand to-night. If you don't obey them, you'll be damned just as sure as you live and breathe.

"Thou shalt have no other gods before me." What is a man's god? Anything that he thinks more of than he does of God. With some people it is money. They worship money. Money is just as truly their god as if they would hang a fifty or hundred-dollar bill framed on the wall and pray to it before they get into bed. They do things in business because there is money in it, and they don't care whether they break the law of God or man to make money.

Other people are worshipping society. They do things in their social life, in their dress, and go to places because society demands it, and if they didn't, they would lose their standing. You put society first. You slap God in the face just to please some old, double-chinned, phlegmatic, dogmatic, goutmatic old hen of a society leader.

We are making money by the bucketfuls in this country, but we're going to hell in carload lots, freight prepaid.

Whisky is many a man's god. He thinks more of a whisky bottle, a keg of beer or a case of wine than he does about God. Oh, there are men here who, if they were to die, you would not need to preach their funeral sermon. Embalm them, put them in a coffin, carry them here, then go down to the booze joint and get a bottle of whisky or champagne and put it in their coffin. That is the story of their life.

There are some women here tonight, if they would die, they would not need to preach their funeral sermon. All you have lived for is to show off in society and all you think your body is for is to be a fashionable frame upon which to hang fashion's garments and a digestive apparatus with which to gormandize upon all the viands that a rich husband can give you.

"Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain." I would not trust a profane man any too far in any transaction. One of the things that shows the foundation of a man's character to be rotten is to hear him cuss and spew and vomit out oaths. "Remember the Sabbath Day to keep it holy." How much Sabbath-breaking we have in this country! I tell you, whenever a city turns its theaters loose on Sunday and has its baseball parks open, it is putting the red flag down the track.

"Honor thy father and thy mother." The young man or young woman who is ashamed of his or her father and mother because the brilliancy has faded out of their eyes and the roses have fled from their cheeks is a fool.

If your mother had thought a little more of herself perhaps she would be just as pretty as you think you are now, for there was a time when she was just as handsome and attractive as you are now, you little frizzy-headed sissy.

And I want to tell you that the wrinkles in her face and the care lines in her cheeks, and that weary, tired look in her eyes, those scars are love marks for you, yet you pass her up. So when you look on your father's white hair and his wrinkled face and his slow step and his awkward hand, remember that these marks and markings of human beauty are simply marks of his love for you.

"Thou shalt not kill." Somebody says: "We are all right there, Bill, we haven't murdered anybody." But listen! It doesn't say anything about that. There are other ways of killing besides sticking a dagger in somebody's heart, shooting their brains out, pounding their head to a pulp with a club or an ax.

There is many a husband who is killing his wife because she has found he is false to his vows and his promises. Many a husband is killing his wife by neglect. He is showing more love for some other woman than for the woman who left a great deal better home than he ever gave her.

There are other ways of killing, I say. I mean the woman who reddens her hands with the blood of her unborn offspring to relieve herself from the cares of motherhood, so that she can flirt in godless whisky, wine, champagne, card-playing, Sabbath-breaking society.

"Thou shalt not commit adultery." I am not going to talk very much on that now for the reason that this isn't the place. But I want to tell you that there is no sin on earth in all the world that God so rails against as he does the sin of adultery. There is no sin on earth that is more damning and blighting. I tell you there is no shorter, quicker route to hell than by the road of lust.

"Thou shalt not steal." Listen a minute. A man is a thief when he takes that for which he does not give adequate return, either in property, work or money. A man is a thief when he makes false representation. A man is a thief when he says: "This is all wool," and it is half cotton. A man is a thief when he says: "That is imported," when it was made in Philadelphia. A man is a thief when he says: "This is a pure article," when it is adulterated. If he knows it, understand, he is a thief.

The employer that makes the workingman work for wages that keep him on the verge of starvation and don't begin to pay him for the labor he expends is a thief; so is the workingman that doesn't give his employer an honest return for his wages a thief. The church that holds a lottery is a thief, too.

"Thou shalt not bear false witness." I know some of you in here don't like what I'm saying, but that don't worry me a bit. I'm handing you out the straight truth, and truth hurts.

Here's one for you, sister: There are three ways to spread news—telephone, telegraph and tell a woman.

You run into your neighbor's in the early morning. You have a fascinator on, your hair is in curl papers and your hands are covered with dough. You say: "Good morning, Mrs. J.; have you heard the latest news about Mrs. S.? I feel so sorry for the family." You are a miserable old liar, for if you felt sorry you would keep your old mouth shut. The devil is so afraid of some of you women he wouldn't get within twenty feet of you.

"Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's house, nor his man-servant, nor his maid-servant, nor his ass, nor his ox, nor anything that is thy neighbor's." That means his automobile. They didn't have them then, or Moses would have put one in. Nor his rubber-tired carriage. They didn't have those, either. Nor his steam yacht, nor his private car. If your neighbor has a girl that is a good cook, don't go nosing around and ask how much they pay her a week, and then offer her 25 or 50 cents more to get her.

Many a man would like to have his neighbor's wife. You let her alone. Keep your eyes for your own.

Stand up and let God measure you and see how far short you come of being what God's requirements are. Have you kept the law? If you have broken every commandment in that Book, and accept Jesus Christ as your Saviour, God will forgive you. He has promised to do it.

THE DOCTOR'S WE

Agrees With Him About F.

A trained nurse says: "In the practice of my profession I have found many points in favor of Grape-Nuts for that I unhesitatingly recommend it to all my patients."

"It is delicate and pleasing to the palate (an essential in food for the sick) and can be adapted to all ages, being often used with milk or cream for babies or aged when deficiency of teeth renders mastication impossible. For fever patients on those on liquid diet I find Grape-Nuts and albumen water very very nourishing and refreshing."

"This recipe is my own idea and made as follows: Soak a teaspoonful of Grape-Nuts in a glass of water for an hour, strain and serve with the beaten white of an egg and a spoonful of fruit juice for flavoring. This affords a deal of nourishment that even the weakest stomach can assimilate without distress."

"My husband is a physician and he uses Grape-Nuts himself and orders them many times for his patients."

"Personally I regard a dish of Grape-Nuts with fresh or stewed fruit as the ideal breakfast for anyone—well or sick."

In stomach trouble, nervous prostration, etc., a 10-day trial of Grape-Nuts usually work wonders toward recovery and rebuilding and in this way did the trouble. Name given by Post Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

TEN YEARS OF SUCCESS

A record of achievement to the credit of the Postal Life Insurance Company

In 1905 the Postal Life Insurance Company was organized, to carry out the economic idea of selling life insurance direct—without the intervention of agents.

The new plan of saving for the policyholder the cost of the agency system, while economically sound, was thought by some to be an experiment.

The Postal Way is no longer an experiment nor a promise, but an achievement based on actual performance through ten successful years.

At the close of a decade of consistent progress the Company points with satisfaction to what its non-agency method has accomplished. More than 100,000 policyholders, carrying more than $44,000,000 of insurance, procured through this method and through re-insurances, are now upon its books.

And 1915 starts off better than any year that has gone before; during the month of January, more than 4,000 people wrote the Company for insurance information—more than ever applied before during a like period.

The Postal is indeed young in years, but old in achievement, for it has now fully demonstrated in this country what was long ago established in England, that the great business of life insurance can be successfully transacted directly with the public, without the intervention of agents and with consequent savings to policyholders, whether they live in New York, Nebraska, New Mexico, the Northwest territories, or New Zealand.

Service, saving, safety are the chief factors contributing to the success which the Company has earned.

Service

The Postal serves you direct, at its home office, or you may apply by letter and it will forward, by mail only, full official information regarding any standard policy-form.

The Company will also send you on approval the policy itself, so that you can see just what you will get, and when you are once a policyholder it will continue to be at your service for consultation and advice—personally or by letter—which also includes the service of the Company's Health Bureau for policyholders.

Saving

Besides service you will find net cost low in the Postal because you get the benefit of the agent's first-year commission—a substantial saving guaranteed in your policy.

In subsequent years you get the agent's renewal commission, namely 7½%, and you also receive an office-expense saving of 2%, making up the annual dividend of 9½% guaranteed in the Policy.

Beginning at the close of the second year the Postal pays contingent dividends besides, depending on earnings and on the savings resultant from the elimination of the usual numerous branch offices and the various requirements of the States throughout the Union—unnecessary under the non-agency plan.

Report of condition at the close of business, December 31, 1914

Safety

The Postal is safe because it sets aside the full reserves required by law and necessary for the payment of all policy-claims, now and in the future.

In addition to this reserve of more than $9,000,000 the Postal carries a surplus and has ample funds at interest in leading banks, and a special deposit of $100,000 with the State of New York, where the Company is chartered.

Though only ten years old, it now pays—and promptly—more than a million dollars a year to beneficiaries through-out the Union and elsewhere.

Success

No small share of the Company's success is due to the friendliness of its policyholders, through whose good words during the last year and a half the Company has secured more than a quarter of a million of new business.

The Postal has proved that insurance can be written without agents at an average cost of $10 a thousand, that being about one-sixth of what other companies pay their agents as commissions. By the non-agency way alone the Company has enrolled nearly 8,000 policyholders, representing insurance amounting to more than $14,000,000. Under these contracts alone there has been paid $409,761.55.

Because of its non-agency savings it was able to re-insure (by official approval of the State Insurance Department) two other companies not making headway under the expensive agency system; and after having by its economies made up an impairment of reserve in one aggregating $80,000, has also paid out under these re-insurances $6,522,690.03—a magnificent sum.

Find Out What You Can Save

It will pay you to find out just what the Postal Life can and will do for you. The Company issues all the standard legal-reserve policy-forms; it supplies full official information to all applicants wherever they may live. Either call at the Company's offices or just write and say:

Mail me life-insurance particulars for my age as mentioned in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for February 24th

In your letter be sure to give:

1. Your Full Name
2. Your Occupation
3. The Exact Date of Your Birth

The request for information places you under no obligations and no agent will be sent to visit you. Without disparagement of honest agents in any way, the Postal Life does not employ agents at all; the resultant commission-savings go to you because you deal direct.

Strong Postal Points

- First: Standard Policy reserves, now more than $9,000,000. Insurance in force more than $44,000,000.
- Second: Old-line legal reserve insurance—not fraternal or assessment.
- Third: Standard policy-provisions, approved by the New York State Insurance Department.
- Fourth: Operates under strict New York State requirements and subject to the United States Postal Authorities.
- Fifth: High medical standards in the selection of risks.
- Sixth: Policyholders' Health Bureau arranges one free medical examination each year, if desired.

CAN YOU ANSWER THESE Bible Questions?

Has a man two natures?
Is misfortune a judgment of God?
Is it right to ask for definite blessings?
Is being tempted a sin?
Is trouble sent as a punishment?
Can one be saved without knowing it?
Is wealth an evil or a blessing?
Is confession a Christian duty?
Does God send disease?
Is falsehood ever justifiable?
Can the church heal by faith today?

Should a Christian marry a non-Christian?
What is the "unpardonable sin"?
Is sinlessness possible?
What was the "gift of tongues"?
Did Christ sing any hymns?
What was Jesus' first sermon?
Could Jesus sin?
Was the Ascension in human form?
What language did Christ use on earth?
What does "making friends of Mammon" mean?
What is the "new birth"?

The answers to these and over five hundred other equally important Bible questions are contained in this remarkable volume. Can you afford to be without it?

THIS book is the result of research covering a period of twenty-four years. Its theology is thoroughly sound, being along the lines followed by the ablest living orthodox expositors. For twenty-four years, the Christian Herald has been conducting a chair in Biblical questions. Thousands of intelligent inquiries, addressed to this chair, have covered practically every phase of Christian living and Biblical difficulty. These answers have helped myriads over hard places.

This book is a unique addition to Biblical literature. It will be found a handbook that the user will greatly value and love. We believe this book may become one of the most used of all Bible helps. Published in attractive and durable style.

Questions and Answers

Mrs. C. L. G. Please help me to find rest in Christ. It seems that I cannot be a Christian. I pray, and pray, and cannot get the peace and rest that my soul wants. I am a sinner and feel that I am lost if I can't get the right feeling in my heart. I am in bad health. Please pray that I be made whole physically and spiritually. I want to love the Saviour with all my heart, but feel something keeping me from doing so. Is it right that I think of myself so much? I am always thinking how much I want to be a Christian and be well.

Do you remember that the first word of the angel who announced Christ's coming to the shepherds was "Fear not"? You are being tormented with fear. This fear is the cause not only of your spiritual distress, but very likely has also much to do with your physical ill health. You must deal with yourself just as you would deal with a child who is afraid of ghosts. Tell him there are no ghosts; there is nothing to be afraid of. Now the thing that torments you is just as untrue as the child's thoughts about ghosts. Your ghost is the thought that God is not kind. This is not true. He is so kind that he sent Christ to save you. Since he did so, why should you fear and doubt any longer? "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved," is just as true for you as it was true for the Philippian jailer and for the millions more who have tested it. But if you will not believe, if you insist on fearing instead, you will continue to live in torment. Do not wait for a "right feeling." That cannot come till you stop fearing and begin to trust. Perhaps you do think of yourself too much. Fix your eyes on Christ. Realize his great love and power, and remember that he loves you just as much as he loves anybody. He surely will save you. Take him by faith as your Saviour. Begin to live for others. Spend what strength you have in service for others, and he will give you more. Isa. 40: 29-31.

C. M. D. B., Washington, D. C. Jesus placed no limitations on the prevailing power of prayer. He has said, however, that we ought to seek first the things of the kingdom, and all the rest will be added; that is, a sufficiency for our needs. We should strive to know what are the things for which we should pray, and that are according to his will. Thus, to pray for wealth or for power could not be considered as coming in this category. The granting of such desires might be followed with evil to ourselves and others. Hence, it is right to say that we should pray for those things that he knows to be best for us, and which are in accordance with his will. The reference to praying for the removal of mountains is a figure of speech designed to show the vastness of God's munificence when our faith rises to meet it. The prayer of faith can remove mountains of difficulty from our path, and can overcome the seemingly insurmountable. The believer, therefore, should ask to be led that he may not pray amiss, through a wish to indulge in mere worldly desires. Many good Christians who live by faith have acknowledged in their experience instances in which their prayers have been denied, and they have been able to see later what a calamity it would have been to them had their desires been granted.

J. R. S., Austin, Minn. The passage in I Peter 4: 6: "For this cause was the Gospel preached also to them that are dead," etc., is obscure, and has been a subject of much discussion. Leading commentators take it in a broad and comprehensive sense to mean this: "The Judge of all is ready to judge the quick and the dead—the dead who in their lifetime had the Gospel preached to them, that so they may be judged at last as those living now, and that those among them who embraced the Gospel so preached, thus escaping condemnation, may live unto God in the Spirit." The Gospel was preached, in substance, in the Old Testament church, though neither as fully nor clearly as afterward.

E. P. M., Red Oak, Iowa. In the days of the Judges in Israel, the rule was patriarchal. They were chosen for their moral fitness, their experience, and their rectitude; yet none of the most notable among them was of priestly lineage. Some were appointed to do particular services, for which they were specially qualified, or to correct evils that had arisen in the community. One commentator writes: "God allowed them judges in the persons of faithful men, who acted, for the most part, as agents of the divine will—regents of the invisible King—and who would be more inclined to act as loyal vassals of Jehovah than kings, who would develop notions of independent right and royal privileges, which would draw attention from their true faith in theocracy. In the great dependence of the Judges upon the one King we see the secret of their institutions. Israel enjoyed more liberty and happiness under the Judges than under the monarchy shown in the record; yet they were example of the nations around them for a king. Read the warning written by Samuel in I. Sam. 8: 10-19—an example which was literally fulfilled.

Mrs. R. D., California. What kind of a state am I in when I am yielded to God? The best I know, and desire to love him with my heart and serve him faithfully, and saying I do believe and trust him, yet painfully conscious that my heart is not as it should be. I lost the sweet consciousness of sins forgiven years ago, not knowing I could so easily be lost. I drifted into sin and worldliness. For years I have been in a state of anxiety. I pray and fast the best I know how, yet cannot get assurance that "It is well with my soul." I am pestered with unbidden thoughts that are forced into my mind and that I cannot shake, when I desire so much to have my mind stayed on spiritual things.

Read the answer to Mrs. C. L. G. in another column. Your cases differ in some respects, but in others are similar. You are right in feeling that it does no good to say you trust Christ when in your heart you doubt him. I should strongly advise you to get into the most spiritual atmosphere you can find. Make your worship with people who have "the love of the Lord" for their strength, and you will find it easy to trust the Saviour who has blessed them so richly, and their blessings will overflow upon your own soul. Turn resolutely away from turning your back upon all forms of worldliness that might hinder your spiritual life. Settle the matter once and for all. Christ has forgiven every sin of the past; believe heartily that he will keep you from sin in the future. If any of the wrong-doing of the past is of a nature that can be made right by confession and restitution, determine to "get right with God," and go resolutely till you find the place where you can and do trust him with your whole heart, regard to thoughts of evil, remember the words: "I cannot prevent the birds from flying over my head, but I can prevent them from building nests in my hair." So long as the thoughts of evil are distressing to you, do not banish them instantly from your mind, but do not account them sinful. And by rejecting Christ and getting interested in the pleasures of others you will more and more crowd out the suggestions of evil.

Rev. A. J. R., Oxford, W. Va. The passage in which Paul referred in his speech at Athens (Acts 17: 28) when he made the quotation, "For we are also his offspring," is used by some commentators to have been Aristotle who had the same sentiment expressed almost literally in an astronomical poem entitled Phaenomena. Others claim to have discovered the source of the quotation in different places among them Cleanthes and Pindar. The source is uncertain, and it is quite probable that Paul spoke from general recollection rather than in the precise language of any particular author.

Mr. J. D. Mitchell, Lamar, Col. Please publish in your excellent paper the names of those who are your old subscribers. I subscribed first in 1880, and would be glad to hear from those among our readers who have been members of the Christian Herald Family for as long a period as Mr. Mitchell. We have no doubt that there are still many of the Old Guard who will respond to this invitation.

CANADIAN TROOPS BEFORE GOING TO THE FRONT ARE REVIEWED ON SALISBURY PLAIN BY KING GEORGE AND LORD KITCHENER

The American Situation

TWO hemispheres were in a condition of acute tension on February 18, the day announced for the inauguration of the German naval war zone around the British Isles. It went into effect, officially, just after midnight, and the light of dawn revealed a spectacle such as has never paralleled in the history of war. England had circled her coasts with a wall of steel, guarding every port of call with a rare around the island group with an unbroken line of dreadnoughts, cruisers and destroyers. It had been rumored that there was a likelihood of a sudden raid by a German fleet and possibly an attempt at a landing on British soil. But the first day of the new zone passed without incident. France, too, had her coasts and harbors similarly walled and defended

THE WAR IN EUROPE

BY ANTHONY ARNOUX

European journalist of many years' standing; military critic; staff writer of the Paris Daily Mail and Le Temps; contributor to l'Indépendance Belge

PRECEDED BY AN EDITORIAL REVIEW OF THE AMERICAN-ENGLISH-GERMAN NOTES

The two events were thus practically simultaneous. The German note was delivered to Ambassador Gerard in Berlin on the forenoon of February 17, and was then coded and transmitted by him to Washington, being cabled by way of Rome. A brief summary of the note sent in advance by the ambassador had no wise relieved the anxiety, and it was not until the full text of the note was received and read that it was found to be couched in friendly terms while still firmly maintaining the attitude of the German Government as set forth in its first note on the subject.

The new note, which is given in full below, opens with a reference to the friendly relations existing between the two countries, which Germany believes will be bettered by a full understanding. It explains that nothing in the German attitude is designed to injure legitimate commerce and the legitimate shipping of neutrals; the maritime war zone is solely a measure of self-defense against England, which the note charges with repeated violations of international law, the result being that Germany is now as good as cut off from her over-seas supply, while England is abundantly supplied with every class of goods, contraband and otherwise.

There is a pointed reference to the traffic in arms and ammunition now being carried on between American manufacturers and the Allies, which Germany regards as unfriendly if not unneutral. The German Government is determined to do all it can to suppress this supply of war material to its enemies, and takes it for granted that those neutral governments which have thus far done nothing against this traffic will not oppose the effort for its suppression. One of the most forceful passages is that which denounces as a "murderous method of warfare" Britain's effort to starve out her enemy and compel 70,000,000 of people to choose between destitution and submission. Reference is made to the use of the American flag on merchant vessels, and the note charges that this is done by the secret order of the British admiralty. There is an expression of gratification at the recent protest sent by our government to that of England on this subject.

In the German note, the assurance is given that commanders of German submarines have been instructed to refrain from violent action against American merchant ships, so far as they can be recognized. To facilitate such recognition and the safety of our ships, the note suggests that they should be convoyed by American warships, and should carry no contraband. It adds that it would be well for all American ships to be warned to avoid the new war zone until the question of the misuse of neutral flags is settled—a result to which, the note suggests, the United States can contribute by using its influence with England for that purpose.

THE SUBMARINE MAY DECIDE THE WAR

the fleet, but not a single submarine showed itself from sunrise to sunset. In the new war situation it would block commerce in the channel was quite expected and it did; but the great ocean liners and their regular sailings, each having as convoy around the war zone one and destroyers. In our own country the war situation had produced a tension hardly less than that in Europe, although it proceeded from a different cause. The American notes to Germany and England of February 10 awaited answers. The situation was rife, and the silence of Germany was disquieting. People were beginning to ask the question "Will the United States be drawn into the war?" The new complications in the international situation and the possible danger to American shipping in the war zone were uppermost in all minds. It was until February 17, the day before the opening of the war zone, that the long expected answer came from Germany.

ONLY TURRET AND CONNING
TOWER VISIBLE

SUBMERGED AND READY FOR ACTION: INDISTINGUISHABLE IN HIGH SEAS

In Washington, the German note was the principal topic of discussion. While its friendly tone and frankness of explanation were admitted, still it was regarded as possibly the beginning of a very grave situation. Members of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate talked it over, and it was the absorbing theme among congressmen generally, although few cared to express definite opinions at the present stage of affairs, holding that the effect of the note cannot be foreshadowed now, and that it will be necessary for us to wait until Germany itself translates into action the spirit and import of its communication.

As in all times of national excitement, there are those who claim to foresee in the German note the possibilities of complications which may ultimately involve us in the European conflict; but the prevailing view is that the Berlin note, while firm and unyielding in its announcement of Germany's intentions to pursue its policy without change or material modification, is still of a conciliatory character, which affords hope that the questions involved may, under the influence of friendly diplomacy, yield to satisfactory solution.

President Wilson has devoted much of his time to conferences with a view to the preparation of a rejoinder to Germany's presentation of the case. Meanwhile no reply had been received from England up to February 19 to our note of February 10 relative to the use of the American flag on English vessels. A communication was, however, received on February 17 through our ambassador in London, from Sir Edward Grey in reply to our note of December last, protesting against the undue detention of American vessels by British warships. It is a long document, containing some 10,000 words. In substance it denies that Britain has unduly detained our ships, or that its naval operations are the cause of any unfavorable conditions in American trade, which the note points out to be due rather to our shortage of shipping facilities, the consequent diminution of our cotton export trade and the destruction of many neutral vessels by submarine mines. It concedes that foodstuffs for a civil population are not contraband, but says: "In any country in which there exists such a tremendous organization for war as now obtains in Germany, there is no clear division between those whom the government is responsible for feeding and whom it is not." Regarding the right of "visit and search" on neutral vessels, the British note says: "No power in these days can afford to forego the exercise of this right. Vessels which are apparently harmless merchantmen can be used for carrying and laying mines and even fitted to discharge torpedoes. Supplies for submarines can, without difficulty be concealed under other cargoes. The only protection against these risks is to visit and search thoroughly every vessel appearing in the zone of operation, and if the circumstances are such as to render it impossible to carry it out at the spot where the vessel was met with, the only practicable course is to take the ship to some convenient locality for the purpose. To do so is not to be looked upon as a new belligerent right, but as an adaptation of the existing right to the modern conditions of commerce. . . . No war," it claims, "has yet been waged in which neutral individuals have not occasionally suffered from unjustified belligerent action." The note concludes: "It will be our endeavor to avoid injury and loss to neutrals; but the announcement by the German Government of their intention to sink merchant vessels and their cargoes without verification of their nationality or character, and without making any provision for the safety of non-combatant crews or giving them a chance of saving their lives, has made it necessary for his Majesty's Government to consider what measures they should adopt to protect their interests. It is impossible for one belligerent to depart from rules and precedents and for the other to remain bound by them."

When the new war zone decree went into operation, there were nearly 170 American vessels on the Atlantic with cargoes worth many millions destined for ports which could only be reached through the zone belt. New Orleans was represented by 30 ships, Baltimore 40, Norfolk 49, Charleston 12, Boston 7, Galveston 10, and several other ports were also in the list. To these should be added 14 steamers from New York (only three of them flying the American flag). Just what dangers they may encounter in the zone is a matter of conjecture. Germany has disavowed any purpose of imperiling legitimate American craft and cargoes, and has also given assurances that vessels carrying relief supplies will be immune. There remains, however, the danger of mines. It has been stated in the cable despatches that Germany was prepared with 150 submarines, each with an average carrying capacity of 100 mines, which were to be used in closing the war zone. This would mean an aggregate of 15,000 mines distributed throughout the North Sea, the Irish Sea, the Channel and along the west coast of Ireland.

PROGRESS OF THE WAR

By Anthony Arnoux

DURING the week there has been but comparatively little activity on the whole western battle-line. This condition has now lasted since the Soissons affair and has reached such a point

THE ENGLISH REPLY IN FULL

At the Moment of Going to Press the Reply of the English Government to the American Note was Received and is Given in Full Below

THE memorandum communicated on the 11th of February calls attention in courteous and friendly terms to the action of the captain of the British steamer Lusitania in raising the flag of the United States of America when approaching British waters, and says that the Government of the United States feels certain anxiety in considering the possibility of any general use of the flag of the United States by British vessels traversing those waters, since the effect of such a policy might be to bring about a menace to the lives and vessels of United States citizens.

It was understood that the German Government announced their intention of sinking British merchant vessels at sight by torpedoes, without giving any opportunity of making any provision for the saving of the lives of noncombatant crews and passengers. It was in consequence of this threat that the Lusitania raised the United States flag on her inward voyage.

On her subsequent outward voyage a request was made by United States passengers, who were embarking on board of her, that the United States flag should be hoisted presumably to insure their safety. Meanwhile the memorandum from your Excellency had been received. His Majesty's Government did not give any advice to the company as to how to meet this request, and it understood that the Lusitania left Liverpool under the British flag.

It seems unnecessary to say more as regards the Lusitania in particular.

In regard to the use of foreign flags by merchant vessels, the British Merchant Shipping act makes it clear that the use of the British flag by foreign merchant vessels is permitted in time of war for the purpose of escaping capture. It is believed that in the case of some other nations there is similar recognition of the same practice with regard to their flag, and that none of them has forbidden it.

It would, therefore, be unreasonable to expect his Majesty's Government to pass legislation forbidding the use of foreign flags by British merchant vessels to avoid capture by the enemy, now that the German Government have announced their intention to sink merchant vessels at sight with their noncombatant crews, cargoes, and papers, a proceeding hitherto regarded by the opinion of the world not as war, but piracy.

It is felt that the United States Government could not fairly ask the British Government to order British merchant vessels to forego a means, always hitherto permitted, of escaping not only capture, but the much worse fate of sinking and destruction.

Great Britain always has, when a neutral, accorded to vessels of other states at war the liberty to use the British flag as a means of protection against capture, and instances are on record when United States vessels availed themselves of this facility during the American Civil War. It would be contrary to fair expectation if now, when conditions are reversed, the United States and neutral nations were to grudge to British ships the liberty to take similar action.

The British Government have no intention of advising their merchant shipping to use foreign flags as a general practice or to resort to them otherwise than for escaping capture or destruction. The obligation upon a belligerent warship to ascertain definitely for itself the nationality and character of a merchant vessel before capturing it, and a fortiori before sinking and destroying it, has been universally recognized.

If that obligation is fulfilled, the hoisting of a neutral flag on board a British vessel cannot possibly endanger neutral shipping, and the British Government holds that if loss to neutrals is caused by disregard of this obligation it is upon the enemy vessel disregarding it and upon the government giving the orders that it should be disregarded that the sole responsibility for injury to neutrals ought to rest.

that the London Times for the first time since the war had for two days, February 3 and 4, no officers' death notices in its obituary columns. All activity seemed to be reduced to occasional and purposeless bombardments on the extreme western end of the line. It is safe to assume that there has been little or no change from Ypres to the sea.

Coming eastward, calmness prevailed all the week, even about La Bassée. On the portion of the line in front of Rheims the French as a result of a strenuous artillery attack succeeded in gaining some ground. Farther to the east the French made the only important gain by either side during the week, to the northwest of Perthes, where they captured and held the German advanced trenches along a front of about two miles. The rest of the line all the way to Alsace, while there was some fighting, saw no particular changes.

In Alsace there was considerable cannonading and some unimportant skirmishing. One of these skirmishes, however, is worthy of mention, as it was a novelty in warfare—a bayonet charge on skis. This took place in the Vosges. Some fifty Chasseurs Alpins on skis were surrounded by the Germans and summoned to surrender, which they refused to do and pluckily charged with a courage worthy of a better fate than their ensuing capture.

These Chasseurs Alpins are among the finest troops extant, strong-bodied, white-souled boys, well led. I spent a week with detachments of them on two occasions, once in the Dauphiny Mountains and once in the Mont Blanc chain, and finer and nicer men I never want to meet, and in glacier and retreating they equal the best Swiss guides.

The Belgian coast was the scene of two very interesting events during the week. On Friday the largest fleet of aeroplanes and seaplanes ever assembled, thirty-four in all, attacked the Belgian coast towns of Ostend, Bruges, Blankenberge and Zeebrugge, this latter being the most important point. Ostend appears to have suffered most from the attack, which apparently lasted all day. In this place the railroad station is reported to have been burned to the ground, and in Blankenberge also the station is reported damaged. The between these two towns seem to have been as well. Except for damage done to two aeroplanes, the raiding force escaped without injury. Grahame-White, well known in America for having married an American girl, was one of the raiders and fell into the sea, but was rescued.

Hardly had these details reached us when on Tuesday following (February 16) a still larger raid was made on the same places. This time British and French aeroplanes made a new German gun positions at Middelkerke, Zeebrugge and Ostend. The official report says that a considerable success was attained, but the exact details are not at this writing reached.

These raids were, no doubt, to cripple as much as possible the ports which the Germans have made submarine bases before the day when Germany for the opening of her submarine blockade of the British Isles.

About the middle of January persistent rumors were circulating concerning heavy fighting in East Prussia, but nothing really definite and reliable reached us until February 11, when the official bulletin had a detailed narrative account of what is the most considerable German victory since the battle of Tannenberg in this vicinity in the last days of August.

The fighting began on February 6 and lasted nine days. The German troops, about 50,000 strong, partly veterans and partly young troops from the levies, under command of General von Hindenburg, amid fearful weather conditions, defeated the Russian army, consisting of eleven infantry divisions and four cavalry divisions, 198,000 men, then in entrenched positions east of the Murian Lake district. After severe fighting the Russians were driven out of their positions, and their army was completely broken and forced backward or to the border in disorder, when they fled precipitately through the woods towards Suwalki and Augustowo. More than 65,000 prisoners were taken by the Germans, and 175 pieces of artillery, three hospital trains and 150 rail cars of ammunition, besides a large quantity of war material. The Russian loss in killed and wounded is said to be large.

The German forces in this writing are said to have forced them to take refuge in the Russian line of fortresses, Kovno, Suwalki, Augustowo and Ostrolenka, fronting the border at varying distances therefrom. One effect of this victory was to clear German soil completely of Russian troops.

In Poland itself, north of the Vistula, the Germans were also successful in retaking Plock and Bielsk from the Russians, and succeeded in advancing a considerable distance to the eastward to the last named town and in swinging their line forward so as to threaten Warsaw from the north as well as from the west in Central Poland. In the last named territory no important events happened.

In Galicia the Russians have also met with some fortune. The Austrians have completely cleared the Carpathians from one end to the other of their forces, administering repeated severe blows to the enemy, and have succeeded in descending from the mountains into the central plains of the province.

Their most important feat, however, was to drive a wedge through the Russian front at Kovel, ninety-six miles east of Lemberg, and for fifty miles west of Czernowitz, thus splitting the Russian battle line in two, and in connection with the German force at Czernowitz, surrounding the extreme left wing of the Russians.

The story of the war has necessarily given a point of space to the presentation of the German Government's reply to the American note, the text of which begins on page 222.

FANNY CROSBY'S WONDERFUL LIFE ENDED

AFTER a wonderful career of Christian service Fanny Crosby, known and loved throughout the civilized world as "the blind hymn-writer," passed away in her ninety-fifth year at her home in Bridgeport, Conn., on February 25. She had long been in failing health, but notwithstanding the weakness of a naturally frail body, her mind was clear and her interest in her great work of hymnology unimpaired to the last. It has been said by one who knew her well that even a harp was concealed within a human breast. Lay hidden in the heart of Fanny Crosby, for over fifty years it was attuned to the celestial melodies that ever found expression in words. Nor was the tribute exaggerated, for the noble genius of the woman—whose songs, like the blind Homer, were sung in the darkness of her infirmity—has made itself felt wherever the voice of praise is lifted. Of the thousands of hymns she wrote there are many that will long cheer the hearts and brighten the lives of multitudes and to win souls for the gospel, as they have done in the past. Frances Jane Crosby was born at Southeast, Dutchess County, N. Y., March 24, 1820. Her blindness dated from her sixth week, when an infection of the eyes was subjected to improper treatment, resulting in total loss of sight. At that time became apparent that the affliction only served to bring out all that was good and beautiful in the young girl's nature. Her talent for versifying developed in childhood. When only eight years old she composed these verses, which showed that even blindness she had a sweet, contented mind:

Oh what a happy soul I am!
Although I cannot see,
I am resolved that in this world
Contented I will be.
How many blessings I enjoy
That other people don't!
To weep and sigh because I'm blind,
I cannot, and I won't!

She was educated in the Institute for the blind, where in 1847 she began to teach school among the sightless inmates. Her gentle, pleasant nature and amiable disposition made her a universal favorite. Her first "real" hymn, which she often recalled in looking over her career, began with these well-known lines:

We are going, we are going
To a home beyond the skies, was written in New York City for William L. Barry, February 5, 1864, and from that time onward brain and pen wrought diligently and many of her sweet, spiritual hymns became favorites in all Christian lands. Before she began her career as a hymn-writer, she had already written a number of secular pieces for George F. Root, the composer, and had dedicated a little poem of welcome to Henry Clay on the occasion of his visit to New York, after the close of the Mexican War. She had the honor of being the first woman whose voice was ever heard in the United States Senate Chamber, where she recited poetry, by invitation, to a distinguished audience. In the course of her long career as a hymn-writer Fanny Crosby attained, in a degree seldom equaled, the faculty of moving the heart and the religious imagination by her verses. Her sense of rhythm was so perfect. The slightest incident afforded her inspiration, and her productions were the means of soothing the heart of many a sinner. Occasionally she wrote both words and music, for she had received a good musical education and could accompany her piano-playing in a clear soprano. As she grew older, however, she devoted her efforts wholly to literary work, dictating to an amanuensis. Her first volume of verses, entitled "A Blind Girl and Other Poems," was published in 1844, and was followed by others, including "Monterey and Other Poems," and "A Wreath of Columbia's Bells," and in comparatively recent years, "Bells of Evening" and "Memoirs of Eighty Years." While she was a teacher of rhetoric and history in the Institute for the Blind she produced a number of excellent pieces which had a wide popularity, among them such well-known songs as "Hazel Dell," "Prose World, Good-by," "Honeysuckle Glen,"

"There's Music in the Air," "Rosalie, the Prairie Flower"; also two cantatas: "The Flower Queen" and "The Pilgrim Fathers."

Fanny Crosby numbered among her friends many of the best known musical composers in America. This acquaintance was the means of stimulating her poetic talent to increased activity. Many of her hymns were composed to suit the measure and spirit of their musical productions. Dr. W. H. Doane, in April, 1869, spoke to her of a new melody he had just finished, and at her request he played it over. She listened with deep attention and evident appreciation, her poor, sightless eyes turned toward the player. Before an hour had passed she had dictated to an amanuensis her famous hymn, "Safe in the Arms of Jesus," which perfectly expressed the spirit of Dr. Doane's beautiful music, and their united product has been translated into many languages and is sung throughout the world today. Another of her collaborators was Mr. Hubert P.

MISS CROSBY AND IRA D. SANKEY COMPOSING
From the Christian Herald, March 25, 1896

Main, the veteran composer. Mr. Main is said to be the most prolific writer of sacred music in his day and generation. He has written the scores to many of the most beautiful and best known of Fanny Crosby's hymns. Occasionally the order would be reversed, and the composer would play over to his blind auditor some new piece, explaining as he did so what thought, feeling or emotion it was meant to convey. Sitting with hands clasped she would listen quietly, asking him to repeat certain passages, so that she might get them fixed in her mind. Before the impression faded her wonderful talent would unfailingly succeed in producing verses which perfectly expressed the musical theme in language so beautiful and appropriate that it was a marvel to all who knew of her methods. To a keen ear and a retentive memory she added a delicate and true musical perception, which gave her a remarkable power in such tasks.

During the long and active career of the late Ira D. Sankey, he many times collaborated with Fanny Crosby in the production of Gospel hymns. The two were frequently in correspondence over a new piece. Fanny would have an inspiration that would result in a new poem, which she would ask Mr. Sankey to set to music; or the "singing evangelist" would have some new composition for which he would request the blind poet to supply a literary setting. This partnership was productive of hundreds of new hymns, many of which may still be found in the church hymnals. It was at this period of greatest productivity that Fanny Crosby employed a number of different pen-names, including Mary J. Frances, Mrs. A. Van Alstyne, as the author of the new productions.

For upwards of twenty years Fanny Crosby was the warm friend and patron of the Bowery Mission. On more than one occasion she visited the Mission hall in New York, and such visits were marked by great outpourings of the unemployed and destitute, who almost worshiped the blind hymn-writer, and sang her songs in her presence with an energy and earnestness that she used to say "almost carried me off my feet." Regularly as her birthday came around, the men of the Mission remembered her with some kindly souvenir, to which she would respond with a helpful letter or a poem. When she spoke at the Mission, which she did at times, the rough audience was hushed, so that they might not miss a syllable of the feeble voice they loved to hear.

She was married in 1858 to Alexander Van Alstyne, a teacher, blind like herself, and who died in 1902. She made his acquaintance while at the Institution for the Blind.

Among the best known of Fanny Crosby's hymns are the following:

- | | |
|-------------------------------|-------------------------------|
| Saved by Grace | Safe in the Arms of Jesus |
| Blessed Assurance | Pass Me Not, O Gentle Saviour |
| Rescue the Perishing | The Bright Forever |
| I am Thine, O Lord | Jesus, I Come to Thee |
| Just a Word for Jesus | So Near to the Kingdom |
| Jesus, Keep Me Near the Cross | Through the New Jerusalem |
| Saviour, More Than Life to Me | |

There are probably more of her hymns sung today in the churches, in missions, at evangelistic gatherings, at camp-meetings, and elsewhere than any other writer in the domain of American hymnology. Her words have been wedded to the best productions of over a score of composers. She never wrote a hymn that did not breathe the spirit of Christian faith and helpfulness, and her consecrated talent has been the means of winning many souls from sin to salvation.

Coming of a long-lived family, Fanny Crosby inherited those peculiar physical qualities that tend to longevity. She was of a cheerful and contented mind, a bright and pleasing conversationalist and unobtrusively helpful to all with whom she came in contact. In talking, her whole face would light up and her smile would so irradiate it that the colored glasses which she constantly wore were forgotten by the visitor in the charm and old-fashioned grace of her manner. During her long life she had met many prominent Americans and she counted among her friends Presidents Tyler, Van Buren, McKinley and Cleveland, Secretary William H. Seward, General Winfield Scott and Henry Clay. In recognition of her spiritual value to the Christian Church at large, the Methodist Church honored her by observing yearly a day which was known as "Fanny Crosby's Day," when special services of a musical and evangelistic character were held. Her last public appearance was in May, 1911 (she was then ninety-one years old), when she attended a mass meeting held by the Evangelistic Committee in Carnegie Hall, New York.

Perhaps the whole lesson of Fanny Crosby's wonderful life has been interpreted by herself more clearly and simply than could have been done by any other. She said: "I do not know but on the whole it has been a good thing that I have been blind. How in the world could I have lived such a helpful life as I have lived had I not been blind? I am very well satisfied."

Her life was a benediction. The blind hymn-writer, whose sweet songs have cheered so many, and who never in all her ninety-odd years saw the sunlight, or had the pleasure of looking on the faces of those she loved, has gone to that land where there is neither blindness nor sickness and where, with wide-open eyes, and ears attuned to heavenly melodies, she may witness the full realization of the dream for which she struggled so bravely and so faithfully while here on earth.

The funeral services were held in the First Methodist Church of Bridgeport, Conn., on February 15, when many hundred friends assembled. Delegations from various organizations of women were in attendance. White violets, the favorite flowers of the poetess, almost hid the casket from view. The Rev. George M. Brown officiated. The interment took place at Mountain Grove Cemetery.

SAFE IN THE ARMS OF JESUS

SAFE in the arms of Jesus,
Safe on his gentle breast—
There by his love o'er-shaded,
Sweetly my soul shall rest.
Hark! 'tis the voice of angels,
Borne in a song to me,
Over the fields of glory,
Over the jasper sea.

Safe in the arms of Jesus,
Safe from corroding care;
Safe from the world's temptations,
Sin cannot harm me there.
Free from the blight of sorrow,
Free from my doubts and fears;
Only a few more trials,
Only a few more tears.

Jesus, my heart's dear refuge,
Jesus has died for me:
Firm on the Rock of Ages,
Ever my trust shall be.
Here let me wait in patience,
Wait till the night is o'er;
Wait till I see the morning
Break on the golden shore.

THE EVERLASTING ARMS

"The eternal God is thy refuge, and underneath are the everlasting arms." Deut. 33: 27

AMONG Moses' wonderful words at the close of his career, just as he was going home to God, he pronounced his benediction upon Israel, saying: "As thy days, so shall thy strength be. The eternal God is thy refuge, and underneath are the everlasting arms." In the previous verse, he calls Israel "Jeshurun," meaning "my righteous little ones." Christ expressed himself in a similar manner when he said "Suffer the little children to come unto me." The largest and greatest are but children in the family of the divine Father.

We are helplessness and weakness incarnate. God, like a loving parent, invites us to his arms. Repose in his embrace means the impartation of his nature, which is the biggest thought of all history. God in man, and man in God. Though an unsolved mystery, it is a glorious fact. As the child partakes of the looks and nature of the parent, so the child of God becomes like him.

St. Augustine tells of meeting a little child on the seashore, who was pouring ocean water into a hole he had dug in the sand. Augustine said, "What are you doing?" The little fellow replied, "I am trying to pour the ocean into this little hole." The great theologian thought, "That is just the one task of life, to get eternity into our little souls." Jesus came to pour the divine Spirit into human hearts, that we might be filled with all the fulness of God, and that he might, in his arms, caress those he had created for himself. Resting there, our Father pours a little of his infinite ocean of love into our hearts, that we may feel the beat of his bosom, the touch of his everlasting arms, hide in his pavilion, rest our weariness and littleness in the immensity of his Fatherhood.

God's Father-Heart

It is a terrible truth that many of mankind seek the treacherous arms of lust, of transient, sinful pleasures, or, like children, are amused with toys, excited with baubles or absorbed with trivialities, refusing the outstretched eternal arms. Soon they will be crushed in the grip of awful appetites, passions and penalties, like the victims imprisoned in the iron figure that slowly closes its deadly arms around the helpless one. Sinful friendships are faithless; sin disintegrates, for hell is hate. Only heaven is love. There is no refuge for partners in crime, but separate, lonely cells.

In order to find refuge in God's arms, we must be repentant, dutiful and faithful. Dr. Conwell tells of a little boy who had a tendency to overstate things. He was finally told by his father that he could not take him in his arms as he came home at night if he had been guilty of a lie during the day. One night when the father came home, the little fellow rushed towards him, clambering upon his knee, throwing his arms around his father's neck, kissing him again and again, saying, "Papa, hold me tight, for I have not told a lie today." Moses conveyed this idea when he used the words "Jeshurun"—"my righteous little ones." We must be like him to rest in the bosom of his love.

Henry Ward Beecher once introduced an imaginary conversation between Jesus and Mary Magdalene. Christ is moved with compassion to save her. He talks to her as he did to the woman of Samaria. She sees how noble and grand he is and begins to long to be like him. As Jesus gazes upon her, he says, "I will make you my own and give you a place in my royal palace." She cries, "Oh, speak not of that; you don't know how degraded I am." Our Lord answers, "I know all about you. I know I can bring you up out of your degradation." But she insists, "You will never forget my vileness, and afterwards you will regret it." "Oh, no," says the Master, "I will blot out your sins as a thick cloud. I will never make mention of them more." But in desperation the Magdalene exclaims, "I'm not fit. I'm so ignorant and base." "But I will pour my knowledge into your soul, as ointment into a vase that perfumes it." "Oh, I don't think you know me. How sinful, how passionate, how vulgar, how base I have been!" "Yes, I do. Every evil thought, every word you have spoken, all your offenses are known to me." At last, hope rises in her soul as she realizes something of Christ's love and pity for her, and she cries, "Well, take me then, and every power I have in me shall try to requite your love. I will worship you and try to be what you are. But when you take me up among the angels, it may be you will be ashamed of me." "No, I will present you without spot or blemish."

This is but a faint picture, painted by the brilliant imagination of the great preacher. It tries to portray something of infinite compassion, but it is only a miniature of the mighty portrayal of the divine Fatherhood, of the loving Christhood that fills all worlds and all hearts who come within his embrace.

There are no sweeter words in language than "Come unto me and I will give you rest." "Arms" mean restfulness from a tormenting conscience, a gnawing remorse, from the terrors of death, justice, judgment. "Who shall deliver me from the body of this restlessness? I thank God through Jesus Christ, our Lord." Here is our Alabama, a sea of glass before the throne of God.

Rest for my soul I long to find,
I cannot rest till pure within,
Till I am wholly lost in thee.

The almighty arms are protective. The devil cannot break through God's arms. Enemies cannot reach you here. He is a shield as well as a sun, a defense and fortress as well as our grace and glory. "No weapon formed against thee shall prosper and every tongue that shall rise against thee thou shalt condemn." When God with great mercy gathers you in his arms of love, you are safe forever. Like doves seeking shelter from the storm, flying to the ark of safety from the waste of waters, so you will dwell in peace and protection.

His arms are expressive of nearness. When David felt the embrace of forgiving compassion, he exclaimed, "Thou art near, O Lord." And then he added, "He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty. I will say of the Lord, he is my refuge and my fortress; my God; in him will I trust. He shall cover thee with his feathers, and under his wings shalt thou trust." The blessedness of nearness was in David's heart. It was the indwelling of God in the hearts of his children. If the touch of Jesus' fingers healed many of bodily ills, what must it be to be clasped in his arms! If one touch of the hem of his garment sends life into the soul; if Mary's washing, kissing and anointing Jesus' feet meant the washing of her sins away, what must it mean to have him always so near that we can see his smile! We often feel God near us in nature. We see symbols of his wondrous attributes here, but the soul longs for the spiritual personality, for God himself, manifested in Christ, breathing forth upon us forgiving love, precious promises, sweet fellowship, answering petitions. Without such nearness, humanity is far away from the Father. How blessed to know that he is not far from each one of us, though we may be in the uttermost parts of the earth!

In Fellowship

God's arms speak to us of filial affection. Jacob and Joseph loved each other, though they had been separated for twenty-two years; though Jacob had eleven other sons, his sorrow for the lost Joseph was as intense as though he had been an only child. Joseph was in the heart of Jacob always. The first thing Joseph asked his brothers was about his father. "Is he still alive?" What eloquent love is in that expression! Though Jacob was one hundred and thirty years old, bent with sorrow and care, leaning upon his staff, and Joseph the ruler of an empire, still he wanted his father near him and said, as they embraced, "Thou shalt be near unto me." For seventeen more years they dwelt together in Egypt with unfeigned affection. This is but a little sample of God's yearning over the loved ones of his infinite family. We can come nearer to him than child and parent on earth, for a mother may forget her child, but "I will not forget thee."

Arms mean fellowship. Jesus comes and walks with us when we are agreed with him, and in the way the Lord led me."

Sometimes I'm faint and weary,
He knows that I am weak,
And as he bids me lean on him
His help I gladly seek.
He leads me in the paths of light,
Beneath a sunny sky,
And so we walk together,
My Lord and I.

Christ remaineth when all else departs. Do you know the secret code of communication with Christ? Do you understand his language when he speaks? "Let not you be troubled?" "I that speak unto thee am he who feel the might of his everlasting arms, that all he is saying unto you is true. You need further prove his divinity."

Everlasting arms are not around material things cannot hear the voice of love, the embrace of kindness. Man is the only being on this planet who can interpret the music of redemption, see the invisible and know the unknown of love.

Divine arms are an unspeakable comfort in the dying hour. Bishop Quayle tells of a little girl who teased to sit up and hear the conversation at her bedtime hour had come, she listened, but finally fell asleep in her mother's arms. She was gently upstairs to her room, but did not know that in the upper room till her eyes opened in the morning. So Christ giveth his beloved sleep in the arms and when we awake we realize "I am with thee," though in the higher room in God's house. What is death? It is only "asleep in Jesus' arms." He will touch your closed eyes away in the eternal morning.

The Refuge of Souls

A friend said to Bishop Gilbert Haven, "I am nearing the dying hour, 'Good night!' " The bishop replied, "Good night—but it will be 'good morning' when next we meet." Bishop Phillips Brooks said to his friends around his bedside, "Good-by. I am going home." Moody exclaimed as his last words, "I have just been within the gates. I have seen the children's faces. Earth is receding, heaven opening, God is calling!" Paul said, "To die is gain. Death is victory. Mortality is swallowed up of life. The time of my departure is at hand. The winning is near."

Dr. Chapman tells of a clergyman holding a service in an army hospital. He was asked to call to the bedside of a dying soldier. He said he would do so after the singing of the closing hymn "Jesus, Saviour, Pilot Me." As he started to comfort the dying man, the nurse approached, saying "What you were singing the last verse, he passed away repeating the verse as you sang:

"When at last I near the shore,
And the fearful breakers roar
'Twixt me and the peaceful rest,
Then while leaning on thy breast,
May I hear thee say to me,
'Fear not, I will pilot thee!'"

Our Father's are everlasting arms. No power in the universe shall ever be able to pluck us out of his embrace. His arms are everlasting. They will never lose their strength. "Hast thou not heard that the everlasting God fainteth not, neither weary?" Paul begins the eighth of Romans with "no condemnation," and ends the chapter with "separation." So, as we begin to abide in Christ's arms with no condemnation, there will never be an end to the endless future, be any separation. "He abideth forever." If electricity in nature never loses its power, if our Father can energize matter with an endless physical force, will there ever be any cessation of the love that is far away in his heart, but of the forces of the universe?

Whosoever will may come to these arms and you need never go away. He will in his arms cast you out. His outstretched arms are extended to all. His bleeding hands appeal with the eloquence of suffering for you.

DAILY MEDITATION

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR. LED BY J. H. JOWETT, D.D., F. B. MEYER, D.D., REV. E. WHITTIER CASWELL AND CLAYTON S. COOPER

The Watchful Use of Opportunity

SUNDAY, March 7. Ephesians 5: 16. "Redeem the time." The disciple of Christ is to be an expert merchant in the commodity of time. He is to be always engaged in "buying up opportunity." He is to allow no one to be the peer of the faster's servant. His vigilance must never relax; he must never be away from the market. Every moment must be bought up for the King, and used in the service of his kingdom. And therefore the disciple will be busy buying in seasons both grave and gay. He will not allow the ill or to buy any of the brighter seasons for his eternal purpose. Seasons of merriment will be purchased for the Lord; bright moments of wisdom and joy will be gained for him. This will never mean that merriment will lose its sparkle; it will only mean that sunlight will be added to common light, because the merriment will shine with the brightness and purity of the love of Christ. All will be perfectly clean, and therefore translucent, containing nothing which darkens or defiles. Gay-ety will become the most intimate friend of sanctity, and will be the possession of the Lord. And the watchful merchant will also buy up the darker seasons for his Lord. He will not allow his moments of disappointment, or sickness, or adversity, to be owned and used by the devil. He will claim that the black seasons may be used for his Lord, and he will accordingly bring them and offer them to his service. A dark house, with the red light, becomes a temple of ineffable fellowship. But in all these purchases, everything goes to the Lord. To be first in the market must be a constant aim. Let us regard every moment as a precious treasure, and before the enemy of our souls can lay his hand upon it, let us be up and buy for the Lord! J. H. J.

Christ Our Source of Joy and Strength

TODAY, March 8. Isaiah 11: 1-10. "There shall come forth a shoot out of the stock of Jesse, and a branch out of his roots shall bear fruit." The great fulfilment and illustration of these words is seen in the birth of our Lord. The once majestic stem of Jesse was reduced to a humble, unknown family, for which the inn had no room. The old tree had leveled all the proud growth of the forest, and the tree of this family had suffered with the rest. But the root sent up a new and better branch. Out of that cut-down tree sprang a life which remade the world, and has given such joy to mankind as were never known before. But the same is true of our individual experience. When it seems as though we can never recover from the stroke of the ax or the rush of the storm; when there is an uprush of life from the Root, which is Jesus Christ. "He is the root and offspring of David and the bright and morning star." The life of our old love and life are due to nothing ourselves, but to the life-force from the Root. In the life of Christ as a root out of a dry ground. It is a great mistake! He spreads out his roots to the nature of the Holy Trinity, and they who are part of the fatness of that Root spread out in the beauty of perpetual spring. It may be that you are complaining today that you are dried up from the root, that your years are like faded and yellow leaf, and that the joys of life have fled forever. Nay, it is not so, if only you are abiding in Christ. For you, there shall be the old and the new; and as the prophet puts it at the end of the paragraph, your resting-place shall be glorious. At evening the level beams of your life's sunset shall cast a shaft of glory on the earth. It shall be glory! These shall come to you together! F. B. M.

The Christ-Life Brings Soul-Peace

TUESDAY, March 9. Revelation 21: 1. "And I saw a new heaven and a new earth; for the first heaven and the first earth had passed away; and there was no more sea." Here we have, in the words of the mystic, a symbolic picture of the peace of the soul. The sea is a symbol of unrest and turmoil of change and turbulence—a driven thing, a subtle and uncertain force, a thing pictured in the Bible attended by storms, billows, ragings and sin. The seer's vision of the new kingdom of God in the soul of man is a place of harmonious peace, where "there is no more sea." Two things plainly taught in the Bible concerning the peace of the soul are, first, there must be a unity of purpose in one's life, a harmony of our spirit, faculties and senses, so that together a man's life flows steadily and joyfully toward a common end.

A young man spoke to me of his life and temptation: "I seem to be a bundle of fierce contradictions—a lot of risings and fallings. I am just a seesaw of conflicting desires and passions. My real spiritual successes are always shaded by my lapses from virtue and I am afraid to face temptation. Just as I seem about to succeed I am brought low by some distracting betrayal of weakness. Fully half of my life is filled with penitence and disgust of myself. How can I get mastery—peace?"

Here was the common experience of those of us whose lives do not move to harmonious ends. The psalmist spoke of having a peace that is calm as a river; a peace that moves on uninterruptedly, borne along by a still, deep current. The road to peace is harmony of all our life to some worthwhile end. A busy physician of my acquaintance takes history as his pleasure specialty; his book is always in his pocket on trains and in street cars; it takes up all the broken ends of his day and night. His collection grows and is becoming one of the richest historical libraries in the land. I talked to him one day upon the temptations of the physician. He said, "I never think of temptations. I am too busy with my practice and my history." He had gathered up all his stray purposes and desires and knitted them into a single strong strand of ideal resolve. He had brought peace into his life by the road of harmony with a single great note.

Thus the Christian finds his new heaven and new earth in the discovery of a surpassing sympathy of his will with God's will. In the reconciliation of our aims with divine aims lies our peace. Over every detail of life place the question, "What does God want in this particular case?" We thus command God's power and protection in a harmonious co-partnership. In his will is our peace. C. S. Taking God at His Word

WEDNESDAY, March 10. John 4: 39-54. "The man believed the word that Jesus spake unto him and went his way." There was something about the presence of Jesus that compelled faith. The woman at the well, the people of Sychar, and now this nobleman! Jesus simply said to him, "Thy son liveth." That was all. No sign, no renewed assurance, no appeal to emotion or sense. Just the utterance of these majestic lips. Without another word, and apparently without hesitation, the man believed and went his way.

Comparing the length of time occupied on his homeward journey with the distance between Cana and Capernaum, the conviction is forced on us that he made no particular haste back. Why should he? The boy was living, doing well. He was certain of it, and thanked God. He was as sure as though he saw the bright smile dimpling his cheeks. He seems to have spent the night at a wayside inn, and slept off, in a deep childlike sleep, the effects of long watching, intense anxiety and the swift journey to Cana. Could there be a more illuminating illustration of the faith that reckons confidently on the bare word of God!

Suppose you come, as a penitent, to Christ, conscious of a heavy load of sin. It may be for the first time or the thousandth. You tell the sad dark story; not hiding nor extenuating aught, you confess your sins; but do you not recognize that, according to his promise, he is faithful and just to forgive your sins? Whether you feel forgiven or not matters little. Go your way, saying, "I believe that Christ is true; I take his word for it; I am forgiven, not because I feel, but because he promised to put away our sins if we were penitent and believing." F. B. M.

The Inner Calm of the Soul

THURSDAY, March 11. I Thessalonians 4: 10, 11. "But we exhort you . . . that ye study to be quiet!" Paul wrote these words to the people at Thessalonica more than nineteen hundred years ago, but they belong to us today in a peculiar way. Such words of universal adaptation to all ages and all kinds of people reveal the supernaturalism of the Bible. Did you ever stop to think that if you could understand everything in the Bible it would probably lose its fascination for you and you would read it once for all and finish it? Not only for us, but for the generations ahead the Bible has hidden truth when new conditions will require new light from God. The Bible has not been outgrown in all the advances of modernity.

"Study to be quiet!" Quiet in this active, feverish American life of competitive business and ceaseless pleasure-hunting? Yes, and especially in such conditions is quietness of spirit indispensable. Some one defined a fanatic as a man who doubles his enthusiasm when he has lost his aim. Success is not altogether an enthusiastic doing and plunging ahead. Religion is not altogether church work and committee meetings and social service. Religion is realizing the presence of God in the soul. It takes time and detachment from care and hurry to realize anything; it is especially necessary if we are to know God or know ourselves. It is not how much we do, but the spirit in which we do it, that counts—it is the attitude of our mind that determines the character of the result.

If chosen men could never be alone
In deep mid-silence, open-doored with God,
No greatness ever had been dreamed or done.

"In quietness and confidence shall be your strength." C. S. C.

The Christian Life a "Walk with God"

FRIDAY, March 12. Ephesians 5: 15-33. "Look therefore carefully how ye walk." Life is a walk from the cradle to the grave. Our steps emerge from the jeweled gates of birth; traverse rock and sand, enameled meadow and difficult mountain pass; and ultimately descend to the gate of death, which, though somber on this side, is jeweled and radiant on that. In the opening chapters of Genesis we are told that Enoch walked with God; and in the closing chapters of Revelation, that the nations shall walk by the light of the Holy City. And between these extreme points the pages of Scripture are strewn with similar expressions. Life is a pilgrimage on foot, always onward, like a moving staircase.

A walk is made up of steps. Though a man circle the globe he must do it by a step at a time. Thus life, however prolonged, for the most part is made up of trifles, commonplaces, reiterated and simple acts. And what we are in these will determine the color and value of our lives in eternity. Life is not made by rapturous and exalted hours, but by the steps of our daily duty and monotonous commonplaces.

Let us walk worthily of our high calling; 4: 1. Let us walk in the light, God is light; 4: 17; 5: 8. Let us walk in love; 5: 2. Let us walk carefully. Pick your way amid the pitfalls of the world. Gird up your flowing robes with dainty care, lest they be soiled by the filth of the street. Beware of side-tracks, which will beguile you from the narrow path. Especially buy up every opportunity for making progress in the divine life and helping others. So you will walk with God, and he with you, until one day he will say: "Come home with me!" And you will find yourself in the house of many mansions, to go no more out for ever. F. B. M.

Christ's Glory Through the Centuries

SATURDAY, March 13. John 17: 5. "And now, Father, glorify thou me with thine own self, with the glory which I had with thee before the world was." Jesus had been maligned, ostracized and rejected by the men he came to save. He was hunted as an outcast, ridiculed as an impostor, tried as a blasphemer, crucified as a criminal. No wonder he cried, out of the depths of his bruised heart, "Glorify thou me! Let me shine in my real, supreme, divine glory, that I may be vindicated before the universe from misrepresentation, that I may glorify thee by being seen, believed upon and known in my true nature, as the Creator, Redeemer and Saviour of men."

For nearly twenty centuries Christ's infinite glory has been unveiled to mankind. He is shining today in the undimmed splendor which he possessed when he said, "Let there be light!" The day is coming when his glory will fill the whole earth as the waters cover the sea. Let men be careful who seek to throw a shadow across the effulgence of his divine shining, for he is coming again in all the majesty of Deity. Every eye shall see him, every knee shall bow, including those who have pierced him with javelins of unbelief. Then all people will know that he is the God-man, illuminating the universe through transfigured humanity and glorious divinity. E. W. C.

The Miracle at Moundville

BY EARL E. DUDDING

[EDITORIAL NOTE.—The first instalment of this remarkable story of a jail transformation appeared in the Christian Herald of February 24, and described the quarrel between the author and his uncle in which the latter was killed and in consequence of which Earl E. Dudding received a jail sentence, unjustly, according to his story. His physical condition necessitated his being sent to the jail hospital, where he witnessed and experienced conditions little calculated to benefit sick men. Because of his activity in bringing these things to the attention of the warden he found himself the object of hostility on the part of attendants, who apparently determined that he should not get well. The present instalment of the story will be followed by a third.]

THE steward of the hospital realized that if I stayed there much longer I would be appointed in his place, and graft might be done away with. They were taking food away from the patients and selling it to other prisoners. Eggs, milk, beef, bacon and fruit that should have gone to patients were constantly sold by the attendants. In fact, they were doing everything that they ought not to do and I acquired an intimate knowledge of their rascality. They tried to bribe me and I refused to be bribed. I also told them I was not responsible for being there and I would not pay a person for doing something which he ought to do for me as a matter of duty. I had to do without many privileges because I would not pay for them. I could have had more milk had I paid the cook. I could not get my washing done because I refused to pay extra for it. The warden, however, was not aware of this graft system.

All these things were taking place in an atmosphere that, God knows, was sorrowful enough without them. For instance, there was the case of old Sandy Ficklen, a colored man who lay dying of tuberculosis. I went to him and said, "Sandy, haven't you some people to write to?" He said, "Yes, but I can't write." I said, "Well, I'll write them a letter if you want me to." So I wrote his mother a nice letter, and told her where he was, said he was sick and that his chances of recovery were doubtful. I wrote it as though he had written it. I sent the letter off for him.

In a few days a reply came back. He had not heard from his folks for several years. But that letter from his mother was one of the finest I have ever read. She told how distressed she was to hear of his physical condition, but on the other hand, how glad she was to hear from him at all. Thirty minutes after I read that reply from his mother, Sandy Ficklen died. So then I wrote his mother again and told her how her letter had arrived just in time and how her son had died with her name on his lips.

A parallel case was that of a mere boy seventeen years old. He called me to his bedside about ten minutes before he died and asked me in a firm tone, "How long will it be?" I said to him, "Boy, it won't be long." He said to me, "Won't you write mother and let her know that I was thinking of her in my last moments?" I assured him that I would and I did. At the last sound of his voice, my attention was drawn to someone entering the ward. It was the chaplain, the Rev. Dr. Riker. He was greatly interested in the lad and would visit and pray for him every day. He inquired of me how the boy was. I went over to the bedside to see if he was still conscious and found that death had settled it all. The next day a pardon came for the boy, but it was too late!

You can see how distressing all this was. People lying there suffering and dying in the midst of such unsanitary and immoral conditions. After a time, however, I prevailed with some of the attendants. I suggested ways to the cook for improving the cooking; I even helped him cook and did as much as I could to alleviate the condition of the poor patients.

We got rid of the rats; in two weeks there was not one left. We got the bugs out of the beds. The walls, however, were still full of them. I got the warden interested in the problem and he told me to go ahead and clean up all I could. I managed finally to get the prison hospital in as fine a condition as was possible under the circumstances. I was in the hospital for two months. Gradually my health got better, but in the meantime I suppose no man experienced greater agony of mind than I did. There were times when I thought I would go insane.

MEANTIME, while I was in the hospital, certain events occurred which showed that the misery of prison life was not all confined to the hospital. After I had been there five or six days some attendants came in carrying a man on a stretcher. They laid him down on the veranda. He was unconscious. In fact, he had been whipped until he became unconscious. Then they brought him to the hospital. I asked what the trouble was, whereupon another prisoner whispered to me that I had better keep quiet and mind my own business. I did what I could for the man. They had left him lying there without further attention. I felt his pulse. It was very high and I discovered that he was very feverish. I got him some water and gave him a stimulant of some kind. He revived at last, but as soon as he recovered consciousness he was sent back to his cell. He should have been treated in the hospital; but the idea of punishment which prevailed in the place at that time did not permit of it.

He had been beaten in the Tower, which composed one of the corners of the building. In there they bound a man down to whip him, fastening his hands and his feet together. This fellow was whipped until it seemed there was no skin left from the middle of his back down to his knees. Yet in spite of this fact, he was sent to his cell with no other treatment than such as I had been able to give him. He was unable to go to work next morning. But it was the rule to put a man to work immediately after he was whipped. And if he complained he was taken to the Tower and whipped again. What good do such whippings do? They just harden the men and make anarchists of them.

When I first entered the institution they whipped as many as eight and ten men every day. In fact, the whippings were so common that I got used to them. You always knew when a man was being whipped by hearing him scream and yell. The Tower was at one end of the prison. I have heard the cries of men being whipped clear to the other end of the institution. In fact, the yelling of the men was such a nuisance and a horror to the citizens living near the prison that they protested against it.

The whippings were regularly prescribed. A man would be sentenced five or ten lashes, but when he was given the sentence of five he usually got fifty; and when he was given ten he usually got a hundred. I saw one man who, after he was whipped and taken down, was cuffed to two rings seven feet up the wall and compelled to stand the half hanging to the ring for hours. One man who was whipped mercifully and afterward taken to the rings on the wall, lost his mind and was sent to the asylum.

I saw one man who was immediately fully whipped, having been given about one hundred lashes with a leather paddle five feet long and four inches wide, built up and doled with sole-leather so as to make a handle one end, and it weighed about thirty pounds. Three days later, after his injuries and parts were swollen and inflamed, he was taken back to the whipping post and given another unmerciful beating.

Whipping was only one form of punishment. They used a water cure also. In administering the water cure they fastened the man to the wall, arms stretched out so that he took the form of a cross. Having bound him in that position they would throw sixty or seventy pounds of pressure water from the hose upon his face. They shot it into his mouth, his face or part of his body and the water would knock the skin off in spots where it touched. I have seen them whip a man's face until his eyeballs were ready to burst from their sockets. Sometimes the pressure was not heavy at one time as it would be another. But it was terrible torture all times. In winter time the water was turned on just the same at temperature it came from the main. The treatment generally lasted from two minutes up to five.

HOWEVER, the water cure was ministered in extreme cases. There were grades of punishment such as taking away privileges, putting men in stripes (only the lowest grade wore stripes), and the whippings. A great many of the latter were failing to make "tasks." A prescribed amount of work a prisoner is required to accomplish within a definite time. The system is a direct result of labor and is the outcome of the city of the contractors, who

THE DOOR TO FREEDOM—AND SOCIAL OSTRACISM

THE HUSBAND AND FATHER IS "AWAY"

MY MAIDEN SERMON

AUTOBIOGRAPHICAL RECOLLECTIONS OF A MOMENTOUS EVENT IN THEIR MINISTERIAL CAREERS BY FIVE SUCCESSFUL AMERICAN PASTORS. COMPILED BY G. DOUGLAS WARDROP

A Narrow Escape from Breakdown

By Rev. N. McGee Waters, D.D., Tompkins Avenue Congregational Church, Brooklyn, N. Y.

MY "maiden sermon," I think, was the first sermon I preached after I left the seminary. I had practiced on the people more or less while in the seminary, and in courtesy it was called preaching. But now I had completed my seminary course and was invited to the pulpit of the First Church, of Oskaloosa, whose pastor, Dr. Hilton, had just died. Oskaloosa was a small and stirring prairie town of eight thousand people. The First Church was the oldest and leading church of the town. Not a little interest was awakened in the community by my coming to that pulpit of a young minister from the West.

The first Sunday was a beautiful day in May. The church was packed to suffocation. People were standing everywhere. There was scarcely room for the ministers, because of the overflow into it of the auditors, some anxious and very nervous.

Of ministers there were several. Rev. Mr. Waring, a retired minister, had been in charge for several weeks pending my coming. He had a warm heart and tried in every way to smooth the path for the young pastor. He on this day was master of ceremonies. He had invited to the service not only Dr. Hughes from Grinnell, but five or six other ministers. Six of us crowded into that crowded pulpit—I trembling in my limbs and feeling like a criminal being conducted to execution.

The singing was good; the prayer, by one of the sitting ministers, most beautiful and affecting. The mother was not only kindly, but warm even, and good will and welcome. Then Brother Waring asked me to make the notices. He made short work of this, and started in on what he evidently considered the important duty of the day—an introduction of the new minister. He gave an extended biography of the young man, more complimentary than accurate; described preachers from Paul to the present, and wound up by saying that the young man before them combined the excellencies of them all. All this occupied twenty minutes. To me it seemed like eternity. I kept shrinking and shriveling and sinking down in my chair. My tongue was parched, my lips paralyzed, and I prayed to die. He finished and turned to me to arise and read. I felt so weak that I thought I could never stand up. I wanted to cry out, to run away, but could do neither. Neither tongue nor legs would work. I was in a perfect funk.

Like an inspiration I remembered my text, and it came. I had chosen Paul's words in II Cor. 10: 4, and as they came to me I thought I was away out. I arose, tottered to the desk, looked at the breathless audience for a moment, smiled and read my text, "And who is sufficient for these things?" And the audience laughed. I was saved! I had their sympathy. Paul's apt words had released the tension and already they had forgotten I did not know what I said—I did not know I only knew that I had escaped breakdown by a miracle and that the people had been won aside by an embarrassing situation, and were in the heart and soul. I have never ceased to be grateful over introductions. But I have always said, God bless Brother Waring for his intended release, and God bless those good people for their quick sense of humor and their quick sympathy for a young man about to fail."

Joy of First Attempts

By Rev. Charles Lewis Slattery, Rector, Grace Church, New York

CANNOT remember my first sermon.

The last summer that I was in the theological school as a layman, I took charge of a parish in a New England town for a friend who had just been called and who wished to spend the summer vacation. I had acted as a lay reader from time to time in a number of small parishes around Boston, and had read the sermons of Frederick Robertson, John Brooks and Dr. Hodges. With the free summer before me, I thought I should like to begin writing sermons; so I gained the bishop's permission, and to a responsive and patient flock I began to preach what I had learned through experience and through books. I shall never forget the joy of those first attempts to preach the Gospel, nor can I forget my gratitude to those who listened.

The first of these sermons is safely resting at the bottom of my barrel. Since I cannot remember it otherwise, it seems quite as well not to look at it.

A Fifteen-Minute Service

By Rev. William H. Morgan, Pastor Calvary Methodist Episcopal Church

THE first service I ever conducted was in 1887, in a small chapel in St. Paul, Minn. The whole service was not more than fifteen minutes in length. We sang a hymn. Then I tried to pray, but could not, on account of stage fright. I read a few verses of Scripture, but my throat and mouth were so dry I could hardly speak. Another hymn was sung and the collection taken, and then the all-important moment.

I laid my paper on the Bible and announced the text. I tried to speak and could not. I picked up the manuscript and endeavored to read it, but could not see a word or read a line. A cold sweat broke out all over me, and I had to give up. A local preacher got up, said a few sympathetic words and dismissed the congregation.

You can imagine how I felt! How thoroughly discouraged I was! But I determined to succeed in the work to which I knew God had called me.

The next time I tried I did a little better, and the Lord has given me some degree of success.

"Mary Hath Chosen That Good Part"

By Rev. George Roe Vandewater, D.D., St. Andrew's Church (Harlem), New York

MY maiden sermon! How well I recall it! It was written forty years ago. In all the sermons I have prepared since that was written, there never has been one so wholly my own as was that one. With intention or unconsciously, it now seems to me that every public utterance has incorporated more of other men's thoughts and views and methods of discussion than did this first sermon of mine. The text was, "Mary hath chosen that good part." I can recall now the divisions, and my treatment of each. The manuscript is still preserved and is in a library of such, the first of seventeen hundred.

I worked the consideration of the text in a retrogressive manner, first explaining the "good part," then describing "the choice," and then at some length picturing Mary, contrasting her character with that of her sister, who was notable for being "troubled with many things."

That sermon, as I now recall it, was one of the simplest I ever preached. There is no exegesis in it. It was nothing but an earnest utterance on a subject that seemed perfectly clear at the time, clearer a good deal than it has since. But when I come to think about it, I am impressed by the thought that I felt more infallible then than I do now. I didn't know it, but I was a conceited young theologian, right at the brink of a career that has been successful in nothing more than in making this young preacher modest.

That first sermon had an ipse dixit characteristic in every utterance. It expressed "the good part" with special reference to the supereminent characteristics of the Christian religion and particular depreciation of the shortcomings of every other religion. It described the winsome glories of heaven, but was not content until it had suggested Dante in some of the descriptions of hell. There was the usual glorification of Mary and the not unusual depreciation of Martha. I remember that doctrines of the church, and historic creeds, and something like "quod semper" were inserted to fortify the accepted faith, and I would not be at all surprised if in that first endeavor to preach one were to find something about succession which had nothing to do with the subject. The sermon, my maiden effort, was preached in the church where I was baptized and confirmed, and when I preached it, there sat my parents, my family, my friends and my rector, and how in the world I ever dared to do it I cannot imagine! I do not think I was conceited. I know that I felt unworthy. But there was a confidence that I love to recall. I felt sure of my message. I had something to say and I said it.

To tell the truth, that "maiden sermon" of mine worked fairly well. It was not wholly weak, and my best friends never expected anything very strong, so it proved acceptable. As I recall what was said of it, I remember the only thing worth remembering. They said it was a simple sermon of a simple, earnest man. As often as I have been conscious of any failure in my preaching, I am conscious that the failure has been due to a departure from this rule of conduct. What men need today, and what a nation must have if it is to survive, is the simple faith in Jesus Christ, without which any man or nation runs to his fall.

The "good part" of my first sermon, faith in Jesus Christ, is the victory that overcometh the world. Power, culture, any attainment whatsoever lacking this "good part," is foredoomed to failure.

I am not sure that, were I to prepare the last sermon I would ever preach, I could in all Scripture find a better text than the one of my first sermon, preached in 1876—when I was only twenty-two—"Mary hath chosen that good part."

The Knowledge of Good and Evil

By Rev. Richard Morse Hodge, Lecturer in English and Bible Literature, Columbia University

MY first sermon was upon the Knowledge of Good and Evil, and was based on Genesis 3: 5: "Ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil." I chose the subject because it interested me, and it interested me because it perplexed me, and because it perplexed me, the solution of the problem involved promised a development for me and presumably, I hoped, for those also whom I was to address. My problem was how the pursuit of knowledge and its successful prosecution by the scientific method of experiment could be impious when the learners confessedly became more godlike through the experience. "Ye shall be as gods," said the serpent. "Behold, the man is become as one of us, to know good and evil," declared Jehovah (verse 22). I remember that I did not discuss my perplexity in the sermon, because it remained a perplexity when the time for preparation inopportunistically expired, and I had to be content to speak upon the simpler issues of my general subject. I had seen that Jesus identified godliness and goodness; this I took to be an advance upon the Genesis narrative. But years were to pass before I recognized that the double standard of morality for God and man was inherent in the monarchical theory of religion, and that it disappears in favor of a single standard of conduct only on the democratic plane of thought. Many questions had to be raised and answered before I could understand whether a double standard was desirable today, or learn who in general thought that it was sufficient and why, who thinks that it is not desirable and why, what it accomplished in ancient times and does now, and what it has failed to do for the character of its advocates. I still find the study a fruitful pursuit.

What I learned from the preaching of the first sermon was that a subject which I was especially incompetent to discuss was the last topic upon which I should have presumed to speak. I even fancied, on the morning after, that I had learned this much in one lesson. But how can one learn so much at once? He has not only to recognize his danger of presumption, but must identify also what he does not know.

Some men have a fine sense of their limitations from early youth and appear to proceed always upon what they actually know, whether it be little or much. It is principally to such persons that we owe our respect for the tone of authority natural to the accurately informed. The fanatic, who is the unconscious enemy of authority, actually emphasizes its value by his pose. His followers mistake the audacity of his ignorance for evidence, but his innocence of intellectual modesty betrays him. Genuine authority always exhibits both the assurance of knowledge and the reserve of exact not-knowing.

Can Wrong Ever Be Right?

SOME of our Canadian contemporaries are apparently disturbed over the neutrality question. The Christian Guardian of Toronto criticizes the Christian Herald's attitude on the war, basing its objections on the ground that this paper does not approve of the present policy of our government in permitting arms and ammunition to be sent to the belligerents from American ports. It points out what everybody knows, that, under existing conditions, it is impossible for both sides to avail themselves equally of the opportunity to purchase arms in America, for the obvious reason that the Allies control the sea. Therefore, the Guardian urges, to prevent such shipments would be a blow at the Allies and a direct aid to their opponents.

Unfortunately, the Guardian's logic halts here; it will not stand the test of analysis. It seems blind to the fact that a neutral nation, professing to be a Christian power and an advocate of peace, cannot reconcile its professions with the sale of war material to either side. Such course is neither Christian nor neutral. It invalidates all our pretensions as peace-lovers and gives the lie to our profession of Christianity. Nor is it at all a question as to which side is benefited by our traffic in the material of murder. Our act in any case is wicked, hideous, indefensible—a sin before God. Food? Yes. Weapons? NO! We feel that it is a reproach to us as a nation to do what we are doing, and a thing that we shall yet look back upon with shame.

From the outbreak of the war, the Christian Herald has been neutral. It has been fair to both sides in its presentation of events as they have occurred. Accepting the President's advice as to the avoidance of "hostile discussions," it has hoped that by a decent neutrality this nation might be qualified, largely because of its fair-mindedness, to aid in bringing about peace when the opportunity came. The dream has been shattered, and largely by the very traffic which the Guardian defends, but which every right-thinking man and woman in the United States should condemn.

Our Canadian friends are evidently unaware of the fact that not one or two, but all of the neutral nations of Europe—Italy, Holland, Denmark, Norway, Sweden and Switzerland—have laid embargo on the export of arms. The United States enjoys the distinction of being the sole neutral power that is making money out of the war by selling war material—"blood money," the Omaha World-Herald bluntly calls it. There are American steel and iron manufacturers to whose credit it should be stated that they have refused contracts amounting to millions of dollars for supplying shells and other munitions to the combatants. They have declined for "humanitarian reasons" to take a profit on such traffic. But others are not so scrupulous, and consignments of big guns, metallic cartridges and other paraphernalia of the battlefield are going forward steadily to keep up the "devil's carnival."

Are our people blind to these facts? That they are not is made evident by the opposition of a number of journals, which take the same view as the Christian Herald. Those favoring an embargo include the Tacoma News, Los Angeles Times, Denver Express, Wichita Beacon, Kansas City Post, Memphis News-Scimitar, Illinois State Journal, Grand Rapids News, Saginaw Valley News, Dayton News, Norfolk Ledger-Dispatch, Omaha World-Herald, Paterson Call, Paterson Evening News, Toledo Blade, Spokane Chronicle, Troy Record and many others. These are all American publications, printed for and read by Americans.

There is a bill now before Congress providing for an arms-embargo. A few weeks ago a distinguished member of the United States Senate, writing on this subject, gave this striking description of the strange situation: "The spectacle of the United States sending shiploads of food and clothing to the orphaned and widowed people of Europe, and at the same time sending a shipload of guns and ammunition to make more widows and orphans, is one of those grotesque contrasts that we sometimes find. Again, there is so much money invested in the making and sale of arms and war munitions that we have simply been powerless to get anywhere with the bill." He put it in the light in which it should be regarded by all Americans who take the Christian view. Guns and Gospels, peace and powder, ammunition and alms as combinations are simply unthinkable. If Jesus were here, would he give bread to non-combatants with the one hand and shrapnel to combatants with the other? We are surprised to find, even in these warlike times, a single religious journal lift its voice in approval of the supplying of deadly weapons to carry on the great drama of destruction that is now saddening the world.

The Dollar vs. the Child

IT HAS been a long fight to get the anti-child labor bill through the House of Representatives, but the victory was won at last on February 16. The question of attacking the evils of child labor without interfering with the principle of state rights was solved by linking the matter of child labor to interstate commerce. In this idea and the legislative activities based upon it ex-Senator Albert J. Beveridge was a pioneer and an ardent worker. The bill makes it unlawful to transport in interstate commerce mine or quarry products made wholly or in part by children under sixteen years of age, or mill and factory products made by children under fourteen years old, or those between fourteen and sixteen who work more than eight hours a day, or more than six days a week, or later than seven o'clock at night.

This is getting down to real business. We have too long made the dollar the standard, rather than life itself. Our lawmakers will more and more come to understand that we send them to the legislatures or to Congress, not for the purpose of finding ways to make money for a few men, but to safeguard the lives and to promote the comfort of all. Employers of child labor have long been asking reformers the insolent question of Tweed: "What are you going to do about it?" Congress is ready now to give them the people's answer: "If you abuse or harm childhood in making or mining your commodities, you cannot send those commodities forth to the markets of the nation and of the world."

A Singer of Joy, Work and Hope

HOW may one best sum up the life and work of Fanny Crosby? What is it that she has done for the world? An answer is to be found in studying the lines of some of her most widely and deeply loved hymns.

This is what she has done. She has made people feel how kind the Saviour is and how he will fill with gladness the soul that trusts him. She has interpreted him to the world, and to the church. Singing her songs, and realizing what he has meant to her, they have let this blind singer of salvation's raptures lead them to the light. A friend of Christ herself, she has led thousands to that same friendship and quickened love for him in many hearts that were growing cold.

But she did more than stir people up to receive Christ's joys. She summoned them to his service.

To the work, to the work, we are servants of God,
Let us follow the path that our Master has trod.
With the balm of his spirit our strength to renew,
Let us do with our might what our hands find to do.

Still another thing she did—a thing realized more fully now that she has gone than at any time during her inspired life. She has made heaven real. Christian hearts all over the world are thinking wistfully of the splendor of the light which has come at last to those eyes so long darkened and the joy of that meeting she looked forward to so eagerly:

Some day, when fades the golden sun
Beneath the rosy-tinted west,
My blessed Lord shall say, "well done,"
And I shall enter into rest.
And I shall see him face to face,
And tell the story, "Saved by grace."

Does the Spirit Ever Grow Old?

THAT the spirit in man, under average normal conditions, does not age with the body, but retains its youth and freshness even in the face of advancing years, has long been the claim of philosophic observers. "It is a fact often discovered by the aged," remarks a thoughtful writer in Scribner's Magazine, "that folks do not, in the depths of reality, change or grow old. The outside of the man or woman waxes and wanes, but the 'I myself within me'—that something of which we are conscious, that spark of the infinite flame, seems as changeless as eternity." But the spirit in man is not only perennial, even while the outer garment of flesh droops and fades; it is also progressive.

It grows, broadens, expands with the years; if its aims lead it to seek the companionships, the highest purposes, the noblest emotions, the kindest acts and most uplifting thoughts, its development goes on uninterruptedly almost independent of mere surroundings. Bodily age comes and limitations and infirmities crease, the spirit, though hampered by its garment, is still unconquered and indomitable. Perspective changes in the sense that it now with greater interest the past and the future, though it keeps in active sympathetic touch with the present also; yet it has attained that judgment which does not permit the things of the world to outweigh all others, as they too often do. The ultimate goal becomes more clearly defined, the veil that shuts out the future grows transparent. In the face of the aged saint who has walked with God through the years, we seem to see the reflection of the heavenly brightness of a land where age and feebleness are unknown, where the redeemed spirit will realize its eternal youth and endless progress.

Conspiracy in Bread

CONSPIRACY! That is an ugly word, but when the word is used in connection with the supply of food it becomes still uglier. An investigation being conducted in New York City by Deputy Attorney General Alfred Beck before State Senator Meyer Nussbaum, referee, will be watched with intense interest. Becker finds reason to suspect that the manipulations leading to the increased price of wheat and bread amount to a conspiracy, and that it is to be found out.

Surprising facts came out during the testimony. It was learned that the Department of Agriculture did not know and could not tell how much wheat the farmers are holding; how much now in the elevators, nor whether the wheat is being moved rapidly out of the elevator nor farmers shipping to the elevators. Mr. Becker pressed the belief that European speculators had much to do with the situation here. The question of farmers holding wheat for a rise in price will be gone into. Price methods of bakeries will be scrutinized. But most searching will be the examination of the manipulators who arbitrarily raise prices by attempting to corner the bread supply.

Sociologists and missionaries have often warned a half-hearted sort of interest and inaction by stating that more than half the people in the world never have enough to eat, are always more or less conscious of being hungry. We knew this more chiefly India and China, so we could end our warning the horrible words. Lately we have been hearing similar things about the continent of Europe. That has cut a little sharper. Specters of nations threatened with starvation have risen in the naval complications became more tangled. Now in our own country the specter of hunger is larger and darker than ever before. Millions are underfed, because they are underpaid and commodities are overpriced; millions more underfed because fathers and husbands are out of work. Now the price of bread, the poor man's and the outcast's means of going out of his reach.

It is time the public should ask: What is the palace of gold which speculators and manipulators have been rearing will be found to have been built on the flesh of hungry men and weak women and little children. It will, sooner or later, come down bearing to destruction those who built and habituated it. If there has been a conspiracy, let it be laid bare and punished to the utmost.

Comment by the Way

—DR. GEORGE WASHBURN, for thirty-three years a prominent and president of Robert College, Constantinople, died in Boston, Mass., February 15, at the age of eight years. Washburn was a pioneer missionary and also a pioneer in the world of Christian education in foreign lands. He was professor of philosophy at Robert College in 1868; was a prominent man from 1870 to 1878; and president from 1878 till 1909. Dr. Washburn was an authority upon the politics of southeastern Europe, and, besides being a regular contributor to Contemporary Review of London and other American and English periodicals, was the author of Fifty Years in Constantinople. He spoke on Mohammedanism at the World's Parliament of Religions held at Chicago in 1893, and was the Lowell Institute lecturer in Boston, 1909. He labored under the American Board of Foreign Missions, having been ordained a Congregational minister in 1863.

Public Schools for China

THE world is making such rapid intellectual and moral progress that it scarcely halts to read the information contained in a stickful of type that China has determined to establish a public school system for the entire nation. The education of the young in China was at a standstill. The elementary schools were supported by the parents. The government had a system of examinations and higher institutions for the training of the literary men and the officers of state. The honor men at the district examinations are called "men of talent." They entered the competition of the provincial examinations where a recruit of a thousand only could be chosen, who are called "men for promotion," and competed for the highest degree, "men to be presented to the emperor." These received special education at the expense of the government and became the scholars and officers of the empire. The examinations were based solely on the literature of China, and memory as the chief faculty brought into exercise. This state of education existed for centuries, till 1906, when China began to awake, when it was abolished the system requiring study of literature was substituted. Now the astonishing news is learned that the president of the republic has issued an order directing the minister of education to prepare the way throughout China for public schools, largely patterned on Western ideas, it is discarding the best achievements of China's ancestors, "to whom the future of the nation is due." The effect of such action upon the spread of Christianity in "the Flowery Kingdom" and the result cannot be calculated. Public schools in this country have been as valuable as to a wholesome utilitarianism. The system of popular education proposed will be a long step toward ushering in the reign of God in the "Flowery Kingdom." God omnipotent and Christ is our God. Education and the right type of Christianity have always gone hand in hand, and always will. The world has to come to Christ for its education, morals and religion. He has said truly: "I am the way, the truth and the life." (John 14: 6.)

Joy Kills a Man

OVERWHELMED with joy at the receipt of a check for $2,350 in a contested suit for a legacy, Earl C. Wilder, of West Haverstraw, N. Y., died the other day. The relation of the soul to the body is so delicate and deep that the ear often ceases forever from a shock of grief or joy. Many have dropped dead at tragical news of some member of the family. The bullets of sorrow pierced many hearts, and so has grief at untimely death. Excessive joy at sudden good news sometimes causes death. There is one who can give us with a joy which never brings death, but always brings life. It floods the soul with divine rapture and gives it a stronger hold on the body, and a stronger grip on the future to come. Every one living up to the highest standard of Christian experience realizes the meaning of the precious words: "These things have I spoken unto you that my joy might remain in you, and that your joy might be full." (John 15: 11.)

Tramp Plays Organ Solo

A CONCERT was being held in a mission in one of the great cities recently, when one of the tramps who had drifted into the meeting volunteered to play an organ solo. It was The Holy City, and he played it so beautifully that a hundred or so of the down-and-out men wept. All clapped their hands and kept him until he had rendered a half dozen numbers. He said he had been a prominent member of one of the leading churches of the city, and that drink had taken him, like many others among the boys present, down to the bottom. The superintendent of the mission and his wife asked him to stay permanently at the mission, and a publisher of music, who was at the meeting and heard him play, promised to give him employment when he shall have patched up his health a little. A similar case occurred in the Bowery Mission many years ago. Men of the most brilliant and gorgeous imagination, warm affection, lofty ambition, and deep spiritual instinct are the ones that temptation especially marks for its victims. Fortunately, there are influences in the church, and missions to overcome these temptations, and repair their damage, and the hand divine is stretched out for their rescue. The organist had the spark in him left that responded to the breath of the Almighty in the evangelical mission, and was fanned into a flame of penitence and love. Jesus thus describes the return of such a wanderer to virtue and to God: "And he arose and came to his father." (Luke 15: 20.)

SAND DRIFTS THREATEN HOMES

THE turbulent sea has thrown upon the shore such quantities of sand at Salisbury Beach, Mass., as to threaten the destruction of many fine summer homes there. In many cases, the sand has drifted against the houses half way up to the roofs. The restless oceans busy themselves in throwing up sand banks at the mouths of rivers, in estuaries and shallow seas, now making an island off the shore, and then turning it into the mainland. People build their homes close to the ocean for the grandeur of the scenery and the health of their families. But they take more or less risk in getting too close to the ocean, which sometimes becomes very angry and destructive, and they have to take that risk. On the shores of life, the shifting sands of the sea are often thrown up against the structure of human character, to threaten and destroy it. Christ makes reference to a building of this character ruined by the sand, not in banks thrown against it by the wind and tide, but from the sand slipping out from underneath it in a storm and wrecking it: "And every one that heareth these sayings of mine, and doeth them not, shall be likened to a foolish man, which built his house upon the sand; and the rain descended, and the floods came, and the winds blew, and beat upon that house; and it fell; and great was the fall of it." (Matt. 7: 26, 27.)

Must Raise Big Crop

PRESIDENT WILSON, in his speech to the National Chamber of Commerce in Washington recently, called attention to the necessity of doing our utmost to increase planting and sowing throughout the country this year. He said, "Not a plow or spade should be idle." We have to raise much food for Europe in ordinary times; this year we shall have to furnish much more, for the food-producers of Europe have gone from the fields to the war. Every farmer ought to plant this season, as a patriotic duty, every inch of ground he has or can secure. Every man in city or village who is unemployed should seek work in the country to prepare for such a food crisis as occurs seldom in the centuries. The Agricultural Department of the government in Washington is wide awake to the imperative demands for increased food production, and the agricultural departments of the various states and of the different lines of railways are urged to bestir themselves, and the people they represent. Soil conditions are unusually favorable to farmers this year. The ground has an abundance of moisture at this time. With increased acreage and redoubled diligence and good prices, the farmers are likely to have the best year in their history. We shall have to feed not only the hundred millions of our own people, but also many of the millions of Europe, either with food bought by foreign money, or given to the starving by our generous nation. Let the people pray that God in his providence may make this year the most bountiful one in the nation's history. The prophet thus describes the planting of the farmer under divine guidance: "When he hath made plain the face thereof, doth he not cast abroad the fitches, and scatter the cummin, and cast in the principal wheat and the appointed barley and the rye in their place? For his God doth instruct him to discretion, and doth teach him." (Isa. 28: 25, 26.)

Physicians Offer University $1,000,000

WILLIAM J. and Charles H. Mayo, brothers, physicians and surgeons of Rochester, Minn., propose to establish a $1,000,000 foundation for medical research in charge of the University of Minnesota Board of Regents. It is proposed that the interest from the fund be used in research work at Rochester, open to graduate university medical students. At a meeting of the medical college faculty, the plan was approved by a vote of 39 to 26. This action will go to the Medical College Advisory Board, and it is believed will certainly be approved. The medical is one of the most remunerative of the professions. These men have devoted their lives to the health and happiness of others, and their honestly gained wealth no one begrudges them. But they had a larger vision, and a deeper love, and escaped the oblivion of those who gather wealth for themselves only. In spirit as well as service, they have copied Him who cured the bodies as well as the souls of men: "And Jesus went about all the cities and villages, teaching in their synagogues, and preaching the Gospel of the kingdom, and healing every sickness and every disease among the people." (Matt. 9: 35.)

Carry Peace Message

TWENTY-SIX states, as well as many Canadian provinces, with 10,000 exhibits, met in New York at the twenty-sixth annual poultry show, February 12. Soon after the show opened a flock of homing pigeons was sent from the tower of Madison Square Garden to President Wilson with the following message of peace: "The thousands of men and women close to the soil, represented at the Poultry and Pigeon Show, send you their sincerest wishes for continued peace for our country, and for peace for the world as soon as possible." The message carried by the birds was the one the angels brought to earth: "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men." (Luke 2: 14.)

Accidents from the Fog

MANY accidents are reported as the result of a dense fog that settled down upon the east Atlantic coast the other morning. A house across the street could not be seen. There were collisions on the railroads, the elevated and the surface lines; ferryboats ran into each other, and into wrong landing-places; ships went to wreck, all because the people could not see. No matter how keen the physical eye it cannot see unless the atmosphere be clear. Men are often lost in intellectual fog, and flounder about aimlessly, and without destination. Some are enveloped in a foggy moral atmosphere. They do not see the moral quality of an action, and suffer many collisions. There are theological and spiritual fogs which sometimes settle down over ministers. Luckily they are few, and clear vision returns when the sun arises higher up in the heavens. Rev. Dr. Hugh Black, in a current magazine article, advises ministers who have doubts to "burn their own smoke" and not work out any of their unbelief into the sermons to act as a black cloud of smoke to darken souls. As the sun drives away the fog in the natural world, the Sun of Righteousness scatters the fogs of unbelief, and opens the Bible, the cross, and life to the eye of faith. "In him was life; and the life was the light of men." (John 1: 4.)

THE RELIGIOUS ISSUE IN CONGRESS

FREEDOM OF THE PRESS THREATENED BY BILLS INTRODUCED BY ROMAN CATHOLIC CONGRESSMEN

BY W. W. PRESCOTT, Editor Protestant Magazine

FOR many centuries it has been the policy of the Roman Catholic Church to suppress as far as possible both persons and publications advocating anything adverse to her claims. Even at the present time, any book which is regarded by the Roman Congregation of the Index as inimical to the interests of the papacy is placed under the ban, and Roman Catholics throughout the world are forbidden to read it. The history of the censorship of the Church of Rome shows that whenever it has had the power to do so, it has mercilessly suppressed all utterances regarded as hostile to her teachings.

That this is the spirit of Romanism in America at the present time is indicated by the continued efforts to secure the exclusion from the United States mails of such anti-Catholic publications as are especially offensive to the Roman hierarchy. This campaign has been openly carried on for about five years. At its annual meeting held in New Orleans in 1910, the American Federation of Catholic Societies adopted a resolution calling for such an amendment to the revised statutes of the United States as would shut out from the mails publications "which outrage religious convictions of our citizens, and contain scurrilous and slanderous attacks upon faith." At the annual convention of 1911, substantially the same resolution was adopted, the last words being changed to read "slanderous attacks upon our faith." Having been informed by the Post Office Department that under the provisions of the federal constitution such a law as would demand it could not be passed, a campaign was entered upon to induce the postmaster general to exclude these offensive publications under the existing law; but being informed by the solicitor general for the Post Office Department that such a construction of the law was not in harmony with the decisions of the courts, an appeal was made to Congress for new legislation granting the desired power to the postmaster general. Under the leadership of Roman Catholic papers, the faithful in all parts of this country have passed resolutions and have written to congressmen urging the enactment of the desired legislation.

With the evident purpose of satisfying this demand, Mr. Fitzgerald of New York proposed an amendment to the postal appropriation bill which would give to the postmaster general large discretionary authority in the matter of excluding publications "of an indecent, immoral, scurrilous or libelous character" from the United States mails. This amendment was shut out on a point of order, but a little later Mr. Fitzgerald introduced a bill (H. R. 20644) embodying the same provisions. This was followed a little later by bills (H. R. 20780 and H. R. 21183) introduced by Mr. Gallivan of Massachusetts, more radical in their character, although really designed to accomplish the same purpose. These three bills run as follows:

SIXTY-THIRD CONGRESS; THIRD SESSION
H. R. 20644

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

January 7, 1915.

Mr. Fitzgerald introduced the following bill, which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed:

A BILL

To Amend the Postal Laws

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That whenever it shall be established to the satisfaction of the postmaster general that any person is engaged, or represents himself as engaged, in the business of publishing any obscene or immoral books, pamphlets, pictures, prints, engravings, lithographs, photographs, or other publications, matter, or thing of an indecent, immoral, scurrilous or libelous character, and if such person shall, in the opinion of the postmaster general, endeavor to use the post office for the promotion of such business, it is hereby declared that no letter, packet, parcel, newspaper, book, or other thing sent or sought to be sent through the post office by or on behalf of or to or on behalf of such person shall be deemed mailable matter, and the postmaster general shall make the necessary rules and regulations to exclude such non-mailable matter from the mails.

SIXTY-THIRD CONGRESS; THIRD SESSION
H. R. 20780

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

January 11, 1915.

Mr. Gallivan introduced the following bill, which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed:

A BILL

To Amend the Postal Laws

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That whenever it shall be established to the satisfaction of the postmaster general that any person is engaged in the business of publishing any scandalous, scurrilous, indecent, or immoral books, pamphlets, pictures, prints, engravings, lithographs, photographs, or other publications which are, or are represented to be, a reflection on any form of religious worship practiced or held sacred by any citizens of the United States, it is hereby declared that the postmaster general shall make the necessary rules and regulations to exclude such matter from the mails.

SIXTY-THIRD CONGRESS; THIRD SESSION
H. R. 21183

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

January 26, 1915.

Mr. Gallivan introduced the following bill, which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed:

A BILL

To Amend Section Two Hundred and Twelve of the Penal Code

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section two hundred and twelve of the Penal Code of the United States be, and hereby is, amended by striking out said section and inserting in lieu thereof a new section, as follows:

Sec. 212. That all matters otherwise mailable by law, upon the envelope, outside cover, or wrapper of which, or any postal card upon which any of the non-mailable matter described in the foregoing section is written, printed, or otherwise impressed or apparent, is hereby declared unmailable matter and subject to the provisions and penalties set forth in said foregoing section regarding nonmailable matter.

A PUBLIC hearing upon the bills was appointed to be held before the Committee of the House on the Post Office and Post Roads on Monday, February 1. The degree of interest manifested was indicated by the fact that an hour before the appointed time for the hearing, the committee room was densely packed and a large number of persons were standing outside. A certain feeling of expectancy prevailed, indicating that those present were looking for some interesting developments, and the sequel proved that they were not disappointed.

The chairman of the committee, Hon. John A. Moon, first gave opportunity to Mr. Fitzgerald, who introduced H. R. 20644, to make a statement concerning his bill. Mr. Fitzgerald declared that his bill was prompted by the discussion in the report of the postmaster general concerning the transmission through the mails of obscene and scurrilous matter. He thought the postmaster general had sufficient authority under existing law to exclude such publications, but as the postmaster general took another view, this bill was introduced in order to give him the necessary authority. Mr. Fitzgerald declared that "the mails of the United States should not be used to transmit all the foul, filthy, indecent, objectionable literature that evil-minded persons might create and desire to circulate."

Judge Finley, the ranking member of the committee, in a courteous way sought to draw out from Mr. Fitzgerald the admission that his bill was inspired by Roman Catholics, but Mr. Fitzgerald diplomatically avoided committing himself upon this point, affirming that he was simply seeking to vest in the postmaster general the power which that official now stated he did not possess.

Mr. Gallivan of Massachusetts, who introduced the bills H. R. 20780 and 21183, then took the floor to explain the purpose and provisions of his bills. Referring to publications of a defamatory and scurrilous character, Mr. Gallivan stated:

"I am informed, Mr. Chairman, that during the campaign a few months ago literature of that very kind was circulated widely throughout congressional districts in this country, and it may be interesting to certain members of this committee to know that as a consequence of the circulation of that kind of literature, forty-eight Democratic congressmen were defeated either at the primaries or on election day. Now I believe that it is time for either the Post Office Department or the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to do something. What I do here today I do on my own initiative. If any gentleman of the committee desires what Judge Finley asked my predecessor to produce, it is within the power of the committee to summon the postmaster general here with the character of the literature which he describes under the heading 'obscene and scurrilous matter.' We are not here to parade anything or give any entertainment to any multitude who may have come expecting to see some excitement or perhaps make some."

Being asked by Judge Finley what the difference was between H. R. 20780 and 20644, Mr. Gallivan replied that his bill was intended to accomplish the same thing as Mr. Fitzgerald's bill. This was doubtless true, but Mr. Gallivan had expressed the purpose in such bald terms as to interpret the general terms of Mr. Fitzgerald's bill to apply primarily to the discussion of the dogmas and practices of the Roman Catholic Church. As Mr. Fitzgerald and Mr. Gallivan are both Roman Catholics, and as the Roman Catholic press are favoring their work, the average man naturally concludes that this proposed legislation is primarily for the purpose of preventing any offensive discussion of Roman Catholic tenets and practices. This was plainly intimated by Judge Finley, who said to Mr. Gallivan:

"If I understand your bill, the purpose of it is to enable the government to intervene in controversies, political, religious, or of other character. You want the government to intervene and enact a law that will prevent going through the mails the matter of the character referred to in that bill. Then you want the postmaster general to be made sole faculty to determine that question. Now, that may be a religious, political, social, or scientific question. Is it to protect the individual from injury? Are not the courts of this country open for that purpose, and can not they all be protected? and when man oversteps the bounds of free speech cannot that be attended to?"

IT REMAINED, though, for Congressman Maher of New York, the next speaker, to unfold the Roman Catholic program and to make it perfectly clear that special legislation was being sought in the interests of the Roman Catholic Church. Referring to certain publications which he believed were making "a direct attack upon one party, the Catholic Church," Mr. Maher said:

"There are, I understand, 16,000,000 Catholics in this country. There are, approximately, 20,000 priests. I believe I voice their sentiment when I say they want protection from the slanderous, scurrilous, obscene articles circulating through the mails."

This statement by Congressman Maher gave a new turn to the hearing as he had definitely introduced the religious issue, thus opening the way for the discussion of the bills from that standpoint.

The first one who spoke in opposition to the proposed legislation was Randolph H. McKim, D.D., of the Church of the Epiphany, New York, D. C., who declared that he represented the Federation of Protestant ministers of his city, having three hundred members, but was present simply as an American citizen "to protest against bills that seem to me, and which seem consistent with the principles which this great republic rests upon." Dr. McKim voiced opposition against these bills first on the ground that they were unconstitutional, second, that they were unnecessary, third, that they were unconstitutional in their character, and fourth, that they were unconstitutional in their character. He declared that they "involved an attack upon the freedom of the press, and therefore, freedom of speech, and that they were passed without the beginning of the destruction of American liberty." Doctor McKim made it very clear that he was not in favor of the publication and circulation of obscene or scurrilous matter, but that he was opposed to vesting the power to decide the question in the postmaster general, without giving a publisher any opportunity for vindication by due process of law.

DR. W. RUSSELL COLLINS, New York City, editor of the Catholic Worker, next took the floor, and having expressed his satisfaction at the fact that the cat was now let out of the bag, as it had been stated that the real purpose of the proposed legislation was to secure the suppression of anti-Catholic publications, he proceeded to attack the question in such a way as to show his grasp of the real point at issue. The three Roman Catholic congressmen, Messrs. Fitzgerald, Gallivan, and Maher, especially the two latter, by their interruptions and in some instances by such unparliamentary tactics as called for the interference of the chairman, attempted to break the force of Dr. Collins's emphatic statements; but to the evident satisfaction of a large portion of the audience present, Dr. Collins showed himself master of the situation and successfully maintained his ground. When Mr. Gallivan resorted to the archaic Roman Catholic method of argument, and declared one of his statements concerning Roman Catholic theology to be a lie, Dr. Collins simply replied that it was the usual case of ignorance on the part of a Roman Catholic layman, and that it was the common practice for the hierarchy to keep the laymen in ignorance of the true teachings of the church.

Other arguments against the bills were submitted to the committee by the writer of this report; by Prescott C. S. Longacre, secretary of the National Religious Liberty Association; by Mr. S. B. Horton, secretary of the Columbia Religious Liberty Association; by Rev. Howard G. Englar representing the Washington Court of the Guardians of Liberty; by Rev. Clarence A. Vincent, representing the Congregationalists, and by Mr. John D. Bradley, president of the Washington Secular League. Some excellent arguments against the bills were made by these gentlemen, but lack of space forbids giving even a brief outline of them.

ITALY'S GREAT EARTHQUAKE

FLOODS FOLLOW QUAKE IN ITALY. On February 15 new earthquake shocks were felt in Italy in the regions lately overthrown, the damage inflicted being slight in comparison with that previously caused. It is stated that nearly forty thousand people perished as a result of the former earthquake, and of the survivors great numbers are of necessity living in the open air. Torrential rains also visited Italy about the time of this latest shock, causing dangerous floods, particularly in the section immediately about Rome. The Tiber rose fifteen feet above its normal height, and people were driven from their homes to the hills. The Vatican, situated in the lower quarter of Rome, was surrounded by deep water. Everywhere streets overflowed their banks, and bridges were in danger, including the oldest bridge in the city of Rome, built in 639 B.C., and commonly said to be the one defended by Horatius and his two fellow soldiers.

CHINA LOOKING FOR HELP. In the remarkable situation that has developed in Japan and China through the drastic demands made by Japan as a condition of the return to China of Kiahau, China has presented a memorandum of Japan's demands to the United States, Great Britain, France and Russia, and appears that Japan's version of her demands does not agree with that of China. The President is understood to be waiting for complete and reliable information on the subject before committing himself to any course of action relating to protection of American interests.

RAIN QUARANTINING CATTLE. All of the states east of the Mississippi and north of Tennessee were placed under quarantine against the spread of the foot and mouth disease on February 15; and by special regulation after February 17 shipment of livestock anywhere in the United States must be made in dissected cars.

TRIPLE ALLIANCE AGAINST OPIUM. The governments of America, China and the Netherlands have entered into a convention for the suppression of international traffic in opium, cocaine and other habit-forming drugs, nearly one billion people being thus in a measure protected against one of the worst foes of the race. Four days after the announcement in the press of the signing of the convention at The Hague by the ministers of the respective countries, the captain of a British tramp steamship which arrived at the port of New York February 13 with contraband opium concealed aboard was arrested under federal warrant and held for trial. Three Chinese members of the crew were held on the charge of preparing the opium for use. The drug was hidden in the coal bunkers.

TO TEAR CHILDREN FROM THEIR BELOVED MACHINES. Word-pictures of the delight that children take in hugging from their beds to factories to stoop over whirling machines all day and then drag themselves off to sleep, failed to move the House of Representatives from its purpose to put an end to child labor in the United States, and on February 15 the Power bill prohibiting interstate commerce in the products of child labor passed by a vote of 232 to 43, and then went to the Senate, where, unfortunately, it is supposed to have no chance of passing at this session.

TRYING IT ON THE INDIAN. In connection with a pending Congressional Indian appropriation bill an effort is being made, according to the Indian Rights Association, to perpetuate what is described as a misappropriation of public funds to the use of Roman Catholic mission schools, such use or misuse having survived an old law which for a time allowed churches of all denominations government aid in Indian missions. In order to end all governmental financial aid to sectarian institutions a amendment is on foot to bring about a widespread public demand for the defeat of the objectionable clause in the appropriation act in the form of letters and telegrams to representatives in Congress protesting against the adoption of the amendment to House Bill 20150, which seeks to extend the provision of the law of March 2, 1889, relating to the education of the Sioux Indians. It is claimed that such an extension will in principle give Catholic parochial schools federal recognition.

PRESIDENT DEFEATED ON SHIPPING BILL. With success for the administration Ship Purchase bill almost in sight, in the opinion of its friends, though never so admitted by its opponents, the measure was on February 18 by joint consent of the House and Senate put over until February 27 in order that the annual appropriation bills might be disposed of, an action which is considered by all concerned to be tantamount to tabling the measure, as it is practically impossible to take it up and pass it for the President's signature in the four days between February 27 and the close of the session. It was predicted that an extra session would be called to convene immediately after the closing of the present session if the Ship Purchase bill failed of passage, but an extra session is not now expected.

FOREIGN NEUTRAL NATIONS ARE NOW PAINTING THEIR COLORS AND THE SHIPS' NAMES ON THE VESSELS' SIDES, AS IN THE CASE OF THIS HOLLAND STEAMER

MIGHT INSURE AGAINST LOSS OF BUSINESS THROUGH ENDING OF THE WAR. This suggestion of a new field for insurance activity is offered gratuitously because of the vast contracts for war materials entered into by American manufacturers to belligerents in Europe. If accounts are well founded, the termination of the war within a few months would rob American business of hundreds of millions of dollars. It is, of course, frightful to think of the suffering that would be caused in the United States by the loss of so much Christian business! The heavy exports of war materials to Europe has begun to demoralize foreign exchange markets, as immense credit must be arranged for on this account. Up to the first of the year more than one hundred million dollars' worth of supplies for us in conducting the war had been shipped from this country, according to the press.

MASSACHUSETTS ON THE VERGE OF WOMAN SUFFRAGE. After sixty years of effort friends of equal suffrage in Massachusetts were rewarded February 16 by a decisive vote in the state house of representatives in favor of submitting to popular vote an amendment to the state constitution giving women the right to vote, the senate having previously passed the same bill. Crowds of women spectators in the galleries showered the members with flowers when the vote, which stood 196 to 33, was announced.

MAY BE ITALY'S GRAVEST PARLIAMENT. The Italian Parliament reopened at Rome on February 18 with little outward excitement, though the atmosphere was tense with foreboding, as Italy stands so close to the verge of war that even a small incident may cast her into the conflict. Republicans, Nationalists, Socialists and Radicals are said to be waiting an opportunity to align Italy with the Allies, but the elements in favor of neutrality continue to control the situation.

FREE SPEECH COSTLY IN NEW JERSEY ALSO. The press of Texas published lengthy accounts of the fatal attack upon an ex-Catholic priest named William Black recently in the town of Marshall in that state, mention of which was made in the Christian Herald of February 17. The New York Times of February 19 tells the experience in Paterson, N. J., on February 17 of H. L. King, an anti-Catholic orator who had been a priest for twenty-five years and whose speeches on the two preceding nights had inflamed his auditors so that at his third attempt to address them they attacked him with missiles, which he dodged as he continued his talk above the hooting, and finally drove him from the hall under the protection of the mayor, a crowd of some five thousand men and boys outside being held in check by police and the threat of a drenching from a line of fire hose. This mob afterward created a riot before the home of the owner of the hall in which King had spoken.

NEW HOPE OFFERED TO CANCER VICTIMS. As the result of almost a year's experimental use of a new serum with none of the remarkable success has been secured in the treatment of cases that had passed beyond the help of an operation. While this new therapeutic agency, which is administered by injection, is active against malignant growths in general, its effect upon cancer proper is most important, and although it is too early to make positive statements as to the permanent value of the serum an early report is expected from the medical board of the hospital which will give the history thus far of this new ally of medical men in their war upon one of the greatest enemies to human life, and the facts that enter into that report have encouraged physicians and surgeons of wide repute to hope that a great advance has been made in the treatment of cancerous growths.

HUSBANDS MUST BE BREAD-WINNERS. The Indiana state senate on February 16, by a vote of forty-four with none opposed, passed what is nicknamed the "Lazy Husband" bill, providing a fine not exceeding $500 and possible imprisonment not exceeding six months for failure to provide one's wife and children with proper food, clothing, shelter and medical attention.

Questions and Answers

C. B. C., Kirksville, Mo. Is it right to have ice cream suppers in a grove by the church and use the proceeds to get an organ for the church? A sect here teaches that it is not right for a Christian to attend a picnic. Is it right to go to hear a minister who teaches that it is not right to belong to denominational churches?

We devoutly wish that those stern Christians who insist that certain detail acts of conduct are wrong and certain others right would study carefully and prayerfully St. Paul's words about judging and about liberty, Romans 14; 1 Cor. 8; 1 Cor. 10; 19-33. The very heart of the Christian system and the new dispensation is that people, after having love for God and love for their neighbor implanted in their souls, are free; free to use their sanctified judgment in all matters of conduct not definitely prescribed by the moral law. If a church society wishes to go to the labor of arranging a supper and takes the proceeds for the church, no one should find fault, though it is true, on the other hand, that if all the members of the church contributed as much as they should, these functions would not be necessary. As to picnics, what possible objection could any one have to the children of a Sunday school getting together with their parents and teachers for a pleasant day in the woods or by the lakeshore or the sea? As for the minister who preaches against denominations, we think he is mistaken in taking that stand, but no one should say it is wicked to go to listen to his arguments. Read again, and get your friends to read, the great freedom chapters, Gal. 3 to 5.

A. N. S., Topeka, Kan., writes: "In your excellent paper of January 13, you published an article 'Fifty Years in the White House,' which is very interesting to me, giving a delightful interview with Colonel Crook. You make Colonel Crook say that the death of Tad almost broke his father's heart. Probably it was Willie who was referred to, as he died the first years they were in the White House, and Tad did not die till after his father was assassinated. Yet what the writer says about President Lincoln and Tad was true, so far as the father's attachment for Tad was concerned. Often I have seen him sitting on the porch and playing checkers with Tad, or walking down the street hand in hand with him. Tad was a bright boy and all who knew him loved him. We were at the White House as President's Guards for thirty-three months. I was a member of Company K, 150 P.V., sixteen months, was a recruit for the company and was there at the time of the assassination. We were not bodyguards but house guards. One of our company on guard heard the President say that evening, when in the carriage on his way to the theater, that he hated to go, but others who were advertised to be present would not be there, and he disliked to disappoint the people."

Mrs. A. C. G., Jermyn, Pa. The contrivance you mention, which seems to answer questions by pointing to letters spelling certain words when two people rest their hands upon the pointer, cannot possibly have any magic power. You will probably find if you will keep a record that a large percentage of the answers are incoherent. What sensible answers cannot be accounted for by pure accident or coincidence are probably caused by the fact that one of the players, thinking of a possible answer, guides the pointer, it may be entirely unconsciously, to the letters spelling this answer. You may test this by having the players ask the board a series of questions suggested by a third party, the right answers to which are not known to either of the players.

Reader, Mich. Doubtless the thought has occurred to many besides yourself that it is somewhat remarkable that no contemporaneous record was made of the public ministry of Jesus. It has been suggested by certain writers that such a purpose does not seem to have occurred to any of his immediate followers at the beginning of his ministry, although as it developed, and more especially towards the close, it is reasonable to assume that some of his disciples may have kept records of a more or less fragmentary character. John, in the close of his Gospel (21: 24, 25) says distinctly "this is the disciple which testifieth of these things and wrote these things." All four evangelists made records, although at what time cannot be learned, and Jerome states that Theophilus arranged these records into one harmonious work. The Gospels, as we now have them, are to be traced chiefly to the oral teachings of the apostles as their original source; that is, they were proclaimed orally before being committed to
